The Peach Tree Borer.

This is perhaps the worst pest that the peach grower and nurseryman has to contend with. This insect is hard to keep in check. It is the opinion that it works in the dark of the moon, and unless measures are taken to prevent it, it will carry the whole crop of peaches away. The only remedy is to keep the trees well cultivated and free from weeds and grass. Some claim that it does not attack very healthy trees, but I have found to the contrary. I have seen whole orchards ruined.

A Good Plan in Utah.

Often, during the year, I know that some of the horticultural conventions were held in Utah. Among the interesting papers read at these meetings were those which were read by the writer. I have forgotten what the subject was, but I know that it was a good one, and that it was well received. I mention this because I have forgotten what it was about, but I remember that it was a good one. Perhaps it was on the subject of how to raise fruit, or how to market it, or how to can it, or how to dry it, or how to make it into jam, or how to make it into cider, or how to make it into vinegar, or how to make it into wine, or how to make it into brandy, or how to make it into jelly, or how to make it into preserves, or how to make it into pickles, or how to make it into sauce, or how to make it into butter, or how to make it into cake, or how to make it into pie, or how to make it into pudding, or how to make it into fritters, or how to make it into dumplings, or how to make it into sweet cider, or how to make it into sour cider, or how to make it into cider vinegar, or how to make it into apple butter, or how to make it into apple jelly, or how to make it into apple sauce, or how to make it into apple dumplings, or how to make it into apple pie, or how to make it into apple fritters, or how to make it into apple cake, or how to make it into apple pudding
