Drinking.

The Louisville Courier-Journal discourses as follows:

In this country we need to learn how to drink. As a people we are as ignorant on this beautiful fine art as young buffaloes; and we mix our business and our conviviality much as we mix our liquors, that is in the beastliest and most uncivilized fashion. What wonder that we are tormented by occasional visits from the animal kingdom, and, having reduced ourselves to the level of the brute creation, are forced to receive upon a very equal and intimate relation such guests as the monkey, the spider and the snake? Bar-rooms and strapping bar-room counters; "fancy drinks;" drinking between meals; vagabondizing about idle corners: a lack of respect both for the liquor, the company and ourselves; a lack, also, of true geniality, which sits down and takes its time with its draught, and a bit of cheese and cracker beside; drinking before breakfast; drinking on an empty stomach; drinking out of season; drinking decoctions as strong and fiery as mustard or red pepper; drinking, in short, in a thoroughly coarse, vulgar, sensuous, ungentlemonly, unchristian manner is our method of drinking and the cause of our debaucheries, drunkenness and deviltry. We burn the lining of our digestive organs. That which we drink does not instill itself kindly into our blood, but takes rude hold upon our nerves and inflames and destroys them. In Europe it is understood that the very quintessence of inebrious misery—the condensation and the curse of the wretchedest awaking—the abstract and brief chronicle of that headaching and heart-sickness which come from the saddest of all debauches—is experienced by the gentleman who has had the misfortune to be overcome and cut down in his tracks by Champagne. But Champagne is nothing to Whisky: and the trouble with us is that we do not "cool off" upon Seltzer, but upon cocktails, in the mistaken idea that the "hair of the dog is good for his bite." Most of our liquors, too, are impure or overcharged with alcohol. The habit of mixing them adds to the original imperfection, and augments the stimulation. So, all in all, it is no wonder that we are the most grace-forsaken and ungenial drinkers in the world. If you would teach a man temperence, show him the folly of excess. Geniality is indispensable to civilization and to religion. The American, feeling its need, has sought for it in the wrong direction. Tell him he must not seek it at all, and he will rebel; but show him the right way, put him in it, and he will float along like a gondola. He has been rowing wearily and angrily through the slough of strong drink, which is the Slough of Despond—a sewer of bad passions, emptying its corruptions in the dismal Dead Sea.—There is a river of life and light that flows through the happiest part of the world, and its banks are bordered with vine leaves, and its bosom is dotted with pretty craft. The man who launches his boat upon that stream will not have much to fear from the coming of the tempests, albeit there are points to be weathered and craggy promontories to be avoided, and narrows and shallows to be got through and over, as in all streams. But the current is broad and clear; the surface is smooth; the scenery is picturesque and varied. Need we say that this is the Stream of Wine—the natural genius of convivial life and the sturdiest and most irresistible enemy to alcohol—light, simple, wholesome juice of grape, which exists in greatest abundance where there is least intoxication, and is unknown only to those who are given over to the brutality of ignorance and the lust of merely sensuous guzzling?

RAISING FIELD BEANS.—For some reason farmers do not like to raise field beans; why, we do not know, unless they deem the trouble too great for the return made. It may be true that the crop is not a paying one, when good corn or wheat land is used for this purpose exclusively, yet we do not think so, especially when beans command in market a price like the present. But the question of using good soil for this purpose alone, need not be brought forward, for they may be grown abundantly upon land that will produce nothing else, or raised with but very little labor by planting them with corn.

One great trouble with the cultivation of this crop has been the curing process; or in other words drying the vines ready for the threshing floor, and this difficulty has arisen almost entirely from late planting. The vines not having time to mature while in the ground, before the heavy rains and early frosts come on in the fall.—Beans should be planted at the same time of field of corn, and in the same hills with a few inches spaces between the different seeds.

The hills containing both are cultivated together, and the beans will ripen and the vines dry up ready for the flail early in the season, and may be easily gathered by going through the field with a large basket.

Beans are said to contain more life-giving and muscle-forming nutriment than any other vegetable food, two pounds of them containing as much muscle-making element as three pounds of wheat, and give greater stimulent to the brain than three and a half pounds of wheat. They were the staple food in the army during the last war, when they could be obtained, and were the cheapest and best material that could have been furnished our soldiers to enable them to withstand exposure and hardships. For the farmer who is continually performing hard manual labor, they make equally as valuable and economical an article for the table.

ALEXANDRIA INSTITUTE

—FOR—

YOUNG LADIES.

THIS Institution will open its THIRD SESSION on the FIRST MONDAY OF SEPTEMBER next.

Considering the short period which has elapsed since its establishment, it has met with a fair share of success; and the Principal, Mrs. G A. CANFIELD, hopes, by assiduous attention and an increase of public patronage, to raise it, during the ensuing Term, to the first rank among Young Ladies' Seminaries in this or the adjoining States.

The want of a Select Female School has long been felt in this community—this want MRS. CANFIELD purposes to supply, and she hopes that the people of Rapides will second her efforts by patronizing a Home Institution, instead of sending their children to build up schools in other Parishes.

Competent teachers in FRENCH and MUSIC have been employed, and a thorough course of ENGLISH studies will be gone through under the personal instruction of the principal.
