RAILWAYS IN THE TROPICS.

Hard to Keep the Rapidly-Growing Foliage from Becoming an Obstruction.

Not only is the first cost of railway construction in tropical countries very heavy, but the annual maintenance of way is expensive to a degree which cannot be appreciated by those who have had no experience in this connection. The Antioquia railroad, in Colombia, says Charles P. Yeatman, in the Engineering Magazine, cost in a single year, for repairs of track and bridges, $2,268 per mile. The Cauca railroad, in the same year, cost $8,838 per mile. These two roads are in Colombia, and are sometimes mentioned either as future feeders of the Pan-American railroad, or parts of its main line. On the Antioquia road, if the undergrowth were cut at the beginning of the rainy season, less than two months' rain was sufficient to form an arch of green trees thirty feet high, leaning over the track so as to shade it completely.

The constant change from dryness in the day to soaking moisture at night, even in the dry season, would soon ruin the best timber, but nature furnishes a still quicker means of getting rid of it, in the shape of an ant or wood-louse, which is careful not to mar the outside of his domicile, but will patiently honeycomb the inside, until what looks like a solid twelve-by-twelve stick is but a shell from one-eighth to one-fourth inch thick, filled with dust and ants. The native timber suffered so much from the inroads of these pests that, upon hearing that yellow pine was used in Panama to avoid them, a trial of it was made on the Antioquia road. Georgia pine had to be shipped by way of New York, at a cost of nearly $100 per 1,000 feet, board measure, when put in place. When I left there the first of my yellow pine trestles was being replaced. It had been built less than four years.

A Profound Mystery.

The vermiform appendix is about the only thing in the human structure for whose existence science has been unable to discover a reason. The vermiform appendix is a small tube of tissue about as big as half a lead pencil and depending from the colon or big intestine. In this position it is apt to catch cherry pits, seeds of fruit, and other small objects likely to incite inflammation. When that takes place the only way to save the patient is to remove the vermiform appendix, and it is so situated in the body that the operation of taking it out is attended with much deep cutting and consequently much danger.

SUCTION OF A FAST TRAIN.

Geese Caught and Carried Along in Its Wake.

A gentleman who was recently watching a fast passenger train as it sped along from Fort Wayne to Chicago says: "The train made splendid time and left in its wake a cloud of dust that included sand, pebbles, straws and most everything else along the way.

"Where I stood there was a flock of geese picking along the track. The swift approach of the train disturbed them little, and the sound of the whistle was little better than Greek. They did not comprehend it. In a few seconds the engine was upon them. A unanimous flapping of wings followed, and they made great efforts to escape. The truth is that they did escape from the track, but the draft made by the rapid movement sucked the entire flock back under the wheels again. Nearly all were killed.

"One or two escaped the wheels, but they were drawn after the rear end of the train for fully fifty feet by the force of the suction. They were perfectly helpless, and fell to the ground with a thud when the force had passed over. I never clearly realized how much drawing power a moving train really had."

THE VENGEANCE OF WOLVES.

A Pack Kills One of Their Number for Supposed Lying.

During one of my hunting and fishing excursions in Louisiana, says a writer in Forest and Stream, I was fishing on a lake two or three miles long and from one-quarter to one-half mile wide. On one side the hill land came down toward the lake, leaving about one quarter mile of sand beach, and while there I saw a deer running at the top of its speed toward the lake, and a moment later a wolf appeared in hot pursuit. Expecting them to plunge into the lake, when I could overtake and kill them both in the water, I kept my place. Just before the deer reached the water it was caught by the wolf, which pulled it down and killed it. Then the wolf stalked about, looked around, trotted off some distance, and set up a howl, went farther and again howled, and then into the woods, when I heard more howling. The wolf being out of sight I rowed my boat to the place and got the deer, and then went back to my fish hooks. Shortly there appeared on the scene a pack of ten or twelve wolves. They sniffed and moved all around where the deer had been killed. These movements occupied considerable time. They would huddle together, change about, and mixing up trot around in all directions, keeping close together. Finally they got into a fight, the whole pack attacked one wolf and killed it. It was literally bit and chewed to pieces. Now, what was that wolf killed for? The probability is, and I am almost positive, that the dead wolf was the one that killed the deer. I have talked to many hunters upon this subject, and have come across but two who had seen anything similar, and they thought the wolf had been killed for lying. If it was done in the case I saw for lying it was the only time I ever knew a wolf to be killed wrongfully.

TREES IN A CHURCH.

A Curious Little Story With Respect to the "Man of Ross."

Trees are common enough in churchyards, but a tree inside a church is somewhat of a rarity. A correspondent, however, informs the London Million, that there are two trees growing inside the old church of Ross of Herefordshire. They sprang up near the seat formerly occupied by a man named John Kyrle, who acquired fame and distinction many years ago by expending a modest fortune in works of public usefulness. These chiefly took the form of planting elm trees in his native town, in order to brighten and improve its appearance—a work which has since been carried on and extended by the Kyrle society. In consequence of these operations Kyrle became known as the "Man of Ross." Many years later it was found necessary to cut down some of the elm trees near the church, and a curious thing then happened. Immediately after the trees were destroyed two elm trees sprang up inside the church close to the seat which the "Man of Ross" used to occupy when he attended divine service there. The trees were allowed to grow in this strange spot, and may still be seen by visitors to the town.

The Mean Thing.

She (hotly)—Why do men always lie to women?

He (cynically)—Well, the women always insist on complimentary things being said to them, don't they?—Detroit Free Press.

"Tumbler."

Has the origin of this word as applied to the drinking glass ever been inquired into? I have in my possession an old diary, kept by a great uncle of mine in the year 1805, in which occurs the following entry: "Had a few friends to dine, tried my new tumbling glasses; very successful, all got drunk early." I have an indistinct recollection of my parents being in possession of one of these "tumbling glasses," a glass with a bottom somewhat similar to that of a soda-water bottle, so that one had constantly to keep hold of it when in use. Is it not probable that this was the reason of such glasses being styled tumblers?—Notes and Queries.

DAMAGED FOR REVENUE.

A New Scheme for Obtaining Money Without Working.

People Who Claim Payment for Injuries That Are Never Received—Women Are Adepts in the Disreputable Business.

"There is a certain class of people who make a good living by claiming damages for injuries which they have never received," said Sergeant John McSweeney, of the New York police, to a Journal reporter.

"These fakirs are constantly trying new schemes," he continued, "by which to make it appear that they have been disabled through being assaulted or by falling down somebody's stairs or being knocked down by somebody's horse, taking care that in every instance the person claiming to be at fault is amply able to pay.

"Women are very clever at this new trick, and it was through a pretty little widow, who staggered into the stationhouse one day, that I got the first intimation that the game was being generally worked.

"The woman was in the greatest distress apparently, and was scarcely able to stand. When I had given her a chair she said in a faint voice that she had just been run down by a wagon, and that she was certain she had received internal injuries of a severe nature.

"She had taken pains, she said, to take the name of the firm, which was painted on the wagon, and as it was one of the biggest dry goods houses in the city, she proposed to make them pay roundly for their driver's carelessness.

"I at once offered to send for a hospital ambulance," the sergeant went on, "but at this she bridled up and declared that she would allow no one but her family physician to make an examination. Then for the first time I began to suspect that the woman was not as badly hurt as she pretended to be, and I think she must have divined my thoughts, for she suddenly jumped up, and, thanking me shortly for my trouble, started hastily for the door. I was too quick for her, however, and barred her passage into the street. I told her that she could not leave until she had signed a paper that I would prepare releasing the firm from all responsibility for her alleged injuries.

"Of course, I did this only as a further test of the woman's veracity, and it worked beautifully, for she not only signed the release, but reluctantly confessed that her whole story was a myth."

A remarkable case which occurred but a few days ago was that of a man who feigned death in the face of a surgeon's threat to cut him open in order to find out what he had died of.

"I had just come on duty the other evening," said the sergeant, "when a man ran in all out of breath and gasped out that a man had just been knocked down and killed in the saloon at the corner below. Suspecting nothing, I posted the dozen or so officers who happened to be within call on a dead run for the spot, telling them to bring back the dead man and everybody they might find in the place.

"In a few minutes they returned with thirty men and women prisoners, and in the rear of the procession was the dead man, laid out on a window shutter.

"After locking up the crowd in the cellroom, the murdered man was placed on a table and a hurry call sent to Gouverneur hospital for an ambulance.

"The story I got from the prisoners in chorus was that the saloonkeeper, who, by the way, is a wealthy man, had struck the man on the head with a bung starter, and that the latter had promptly fallen down dead. On looking at the man I could see no evidence of life whatever, but when I felt his pulse I found that it was beating away as regularly as a clock.

"Certain now that the fellow was shamming, I determined to give him a good scare, so when the ambulance surgeon came we called all the man's friends into the room and told them we were going to cut him open.

"The surgeon made a great fuss getting out his saws and lancets, but the fakir was game and didn't betray himself by the flicker of an eyelid. The crowd was all agape, of course, and as the surgeon and I tore off the man's waistcoat and shirt the women covered their eyes and groaned.

"'Here goes,' said the surgeon, at last, and, grasping the fellow on the table firmly by the throat, he ran the back of his knife quickly down the man's bare breast. At the first touch of the cold steel the eyes of the corpse flew wide open, and with a yell that could be heard a block he tore himself from the surgeon's grasp and in two jumps was out of the door and on a dead run for the East river.

"Seeing that the game was up, one of the fellow's friends in the crowd confessed at last that the saloonkeeper had merely pushed him out of the door and that he had fallen down and pretended to be dead in the hope that he might be admitted to a hospital, where he would come to life and as soon as possible sue for heavy damages."

A Jealous Office Seeker.

A story is related by London Truth of a French official who was possessed of a very pretty wife and a particularly jealous temperament. This official had frequently applied without success for a certain post. At length his wife proposed to interview the chief in person and see if she could obtain for her husband what he had failed to procure for himself. On this being suggested the latter remained silent for a considerable time, fluctuating between ambition and jealousy. At last he devised a safe course. "Yes, my dear, you have my sanction. But upon one condition only—that you paint your nose a deep red." The lady, it is needless to say, did not proceed with the interview upon these terms. It was afterward commonly said, however, that, the story having reached the chief's ears, he good-naturedly appointed the careful husband to the post.

A Crane's Queer Death.

In the southern part of Indian territory, a singular cyclonic phenomenon was recently witnessed. A small cloud was noticed in the northwest, moving in a southwesterly direction, whirling and twisting like a serpent. Immediately in front of the cloud was a monster crane, which was being borne along by the force behind it, and in apparent enjoyment of the situation, until it encountered a tree and was killed, and the tree snapped in twain an instant later.—Golden Days.
