THE DAILY REBEL.

Stephen A. Douglas.

Mr. May, of Baltimore, made a very able speech in the Yankee Congress against the whole policy of the Yankee Government, and in favor of peace and the immediate recognition of the Confederate States. In the course of his remarks, he made the following statement respecting the late S. A. Douglas:

Mr. Speaker, that eminent and far-seeing statesman, the late Judge Douglas, avowed to me in April preceding his death, his solemn conviction that our political union was at an end. I violate no confidence in repeating his opinions, since he assured me it was his purpose to publish his views at an early day; and if the sequel of his life may seem in conflict with these views there are those among his personal friends here on this floor, who can reconcile his conduct, and show the conformity of his plans with a peaceful though it might be a revolutionary solution of our national troubles. Judge Douglas, on that occasion, read to me an elaborate essay that he told me had cost him more thought and labor than any work of his life; that he feared it was too long, and he wished both to abridge and simplify it, so that it might be read and understood by all; that he would revise it at Chicago and then give it to his countrymen. Death, alas! denied this most patriotic design.

That essay ascribed our present situation to the aggressive spirit of Northern abolitionists. It declared his conviction that the union of our States as originally formed and maintained was finally destroyed, and no political union could exist again between the free and slaveholding States; that such an idea must be abandoned and a commercial union, founded upon the plan generally of the zoll-verein of the States of Germany, be accepted as the only practicable arrangement to secure peace now and hereafter. The masterly paper, every word of which I heard read by himself, and which since his death I have endeavored in vain to procure for the benefit of its wise counsels to our countrymen, fully explained the plan, operation, and results of the zoll verein, and showed how, with certain modifications, it could be adapted to sustain all these principal causes and influences which have hitherto made the United States the happiest and most prosperous of nations.

Mr. May concluded his speech by reading the following resolutions, which he intended to offer for adoption:

Whereas, The deplorable civil war now existing between the States heretofore comprising our Union has failed to restore it, and, if continued longer, will destroy all hope of its restoration in the future, as originally formed and maintained by our Federal Constitution, and no other political Union is either desirable or practicable; and, whereas, the interests of humanity, of civilization, and the future of free Constitutional Government, all concur in requiring that this dreadful contest of arms should be terminated; Therefore,

Be it resolved, 1. That it is the duty of Congress at once to appoint —— commissioners to effect an armistice between the contending armies, and to secure peace at all events.

2. That said commissioners be empowered, by compromise, to restore the Union if possible; but if not, then to arrange the terms of a peaceful separation from the Union, as well of those States which now claim to have seceded, as of such others as, by the will of their people in sovereign conventions assembled, may hereafter ordain to secede; and that said commissioners be solemnly enjoined so to conduct their negotiations as to secure, by every proper and honorable means, if practicable, a more harmonious and permanent reunion of all the States in a commercial if not a political system.

3. That said commissioners make a report of their transactions to Congress as soon as possible, in order that such legislation may be provided as may be necessary to assemble the people of the several States in convention to determine their action in the premises.

4. That in the event of a refusal by the Government of the United States to secure peace, and the only hopes of a reunion upon the terms and by the means herein provided, or by some other practicable plan, it is hereby recommended to the goverments of the several States now composing the Union at once to take measures to effect these objects.
