The Sick Man's Deed of Love.

He was a poor cripple—with fingers twisted out of all useful shape, and lower limbs paralyzed so that he had to drag them after him wearily when he moved through their locomotion—a poor, unhappy, murmuring, and at times, ill-natured cripple, eating the bread which a mother's hard labor procured for him. For hours every fair day during spring, summer and autumn, he might be seen in front of the house where he lived, leaning upon the gate, or sitting on an old bench, looking with a sober face at the romping village children, or dreamingly regarding the passengers who moved with such strong limbs up and down the street. How often bitter envy stung the poor cripple's heart! How often, as the thoughtless village children taunted him cruelly with his misfortune, would he fling harsh maledictions after them. Many pitied the poor cripple; many looked upon him with feelings of disgust and repulsion; but few, if any, sought to do him good.

Not far from where the cripple lived was a man who had been bed-ridden for years, and who was likely to remain so to the end of his days. He was supported by the patient industry of a wife.

"If good works were to be the only passport to heaven," he said to a neighbor one day, "my chances would be small."

"'Well done, good and faithful servant,' is a part of the language of welcome," was replied; and the neighbor looked at the sick man in a way that made him feel a little uncomfortable.

"I am sick and bed-ridden,—what can I do?" he spoke fretfully.

"When little is given, little is required. But if there be only a single talent it must be improved."

"I have no talent," said the invalid.

"Are you sure of that?"

"What can I do? Look at me? No health—no strength—no power to rise from this bed. A poor, helpless creature, burdening my wife. Better for me, and for all, if I were in my grave."

"If that were so, you would be in your grave. But God knows best. There is something for you to do, or you would be no longer permitted to live," said the neighbor.

The sick man shook his head.

"As I came along just now," continued the neighbor, "I stopped to say a word to poor Tom Hicks, the cripple, as he stood swinging on the gate before his mother's house, looking so unhappy that I pitied him in my heart. 'What do you do with yourself all through these long days, Tom?' I asked. 'Nothing,' he replied, moodily. 'Don't you read sometimes?' I queried. 'Can't read,' was his sullen answer.' 'Were you never at school?' I went on. 'No, how can I get to school?' 'Why don't your mother teach you?' 'Because she can't read herself,' replied Tom. 'It isn't too late to begin now,' said I encouragingly; suppose I were to find some one willing to teach you, what would you say?' the poor lad's face brightened as if the sunshine had fallen upon it; and he answered, 'I would say that nothing could please me better.' I promised to find him a teacher, and as I promised, the thought of you, friend Croft, came into my mind. Now, here is something that you can do; a good work in which you can employ your one talent."

The sick man did not respond warmly to this proposition. He had been for so long a mere recipient of good offices—had so long felt himself the object toward which pity and service must tend—that he had nearly lost the relish for good deeds. Idle dependence had made him selfish.

"Give this poor cripple a lesson every day," went on the neighbor, pressing home the subject, "and talk and read to him. Take him in charge as one of God's children, who needs to be instructed and led up to a higher life than the one he is living. Is not this a good and a great work? it is, my friend; one that God has brought to your hand, and in the doing of which there will be great reward. What can you do? Much! Think of that poor boy's weary life, and of the sadder years that lie still before him. What will become of him when his mother dies? The almshouse al ne will open its doors for the helpless one. But who can tell what resources may open before him if stimulated by thought. Take him then, and unlock the doors of a mind that now sits in darkness, that sunlight may come in. To you, it will give a few hours of pleasant work each day. To him, it will be a life-long benefit. Will you do it?"

"Yes."

The sick man could not say "No," though in uttering that half-extorted assent he manifested no warm interest in the case of poor Tom Hicks.

On the next day the cripple came to the sick man and received his first lesson; and every day at an appointed hour, he was in Mr. Croft's room, eager for the instruction he received. Quickly he mastered the alphabet, and as quickly learned to construct small words preparatory to combining them in a reading lesson. After the first three or four days the sick man, who had undertaken this work with reluctance, began to find his heart going down into it. Tom was so grateful, that Mr. Croft found the task of instructing him a real pleasure. The neighbor who had suggested this useful employment of the invalid's time looked in now and then to see how matters were progressing, to speak words of encouragement.

Poor Tom was seen less frequently than before hanging on the gate or sitting idly on the bench before his mother's dwelling; and when you did find him there as of old, you saw a different expression on his face. Soon the children, who had only looked at him, half in fear, from a distance, or come closer to the gate where he stood gazing with his strange eyes out into the street, in order to worry him, began to have a different feeling for the cripple, and one and another stopped occasionally to speak with him; for Tom no longer made queer faces or looked at them as if he would harm them if in his power, nor retorted angrily if they said things to worry him. And now it often happened that a little boy or girl, who had pitied the poor cripple and feared him at the same time, would offer him a flower or an apple, or a handful of nuts, in passing to school; and he would take these gifts thankfully, and feel better all day in remembrance of kindness with which they had been bestowed. Sometimes he would ask to see their books, and his eyes would run eagerly over the pages so far in advance of his comprehension, yet with the hope in his heart, of one day mastering them—for he had grown all athirst for knowledge.

As soon as Tom could read, the children in the neighborhood, who had grown to like him and always gathered around him at the gate when they happened to find him there, supplied him with books, so that he had an abundance of mental food, and now began to repay his benefactor, the bed-ridden man, by reading to him for hours every day.

The mind of Tom had some of the qualities of a sponge—gave out freely at every pressure. Whenever his mind came in contact with another mind, it must either absorb or impart. So he was always talking or always listening when he had anybody who would talk or listen.

There was something about him that strongly attracted the boys in the neighborhood, and he usually had three or four of them around him, and often a dozen, late in the afternoon, when the schools were out. As Tom had entered a new world—the world of books—and was interested in all he found there, the subjects on which he talked with the boys who sought his company were always instructive. There was no nonsense; low, sensual talk, to which boys are sometimes addicted, found no encouragement in his presence. His influence over these boys was therefore of the best kind.

The parents of some of the children when they found their sons going so often to the house of Tom Hicks, felt doubts as to the safety of such intimate intercourse with the cripple, toward whom few were prepossessed, as he bore in the village the reputation of being ill-tempered and depraved, and questioned them very closely in regard to the nature of their intercourse. The report of these boys took their parents by surprise; but on investigation, it proved to be true, and Tom's character soon rose in the public estimation.

Then came, as a natural consequence, inquiry as to the cause of such a change in the unfortunate lad; and the neighbor of the sick man who had instructed Tom told the story of Mr. Croft's agency in the matter. This interested the whole town in both the cripple and his bed-ridden instructor. The people were taken by surprise at such a notable instance of the great good which may sometimes be done where the means look discouragingly small. Mr. Croft was praised for his generous conduct, and not only praised but helped by many who had until now, felt indifferent toward his case—for his good work rebuked them for neglected opportunities.

The cripple's eagerness to learn and rapid progress under the most limited advantages, becoming generally known, a gentleman, whose son had been one of Tom's visitors, and who had grown to be a better boy under his influence, offered to send him in his wagon every day to the school-house, which stood half a mile distant, and have him brought back in the afternoon.

It was the happiest day in Tom's life when he was helped down from the wagon and went hobbling into the school-room.

Before leaving home on that morning, he had made his way up to the sick-room of Mr. Croft.

"I owe it all to you," he said, as he brought the white, thin hand of his benefactor to his lips. It was damp with more than a kiss when he laid it back gently on the bed. "And our Father in heaven will reward you."

"You have done a good work," said the neighbor who had urged Mr. Croft to improve his one talent, as he sat talking with him on that evening about the poor cripple and his opening prospects, "which will not I trust be forgotten in that day when the record of life is opened. Not because of the work itself, but for the true charity which prompted the work. It was begun, I know, in some self-denial, but that self-denial was for another's good; and because you put away love of ease and indifference and forced yourself to do kind offices, because our Heavenly Father has commanded it. God will send a heavenly love of doing good into your soul, which always includes a great reward.

"You said," continued the neighbor, "only a few months ago, 'What can I do?' and spoke as a man who felt that he was deprived of all the means of accomplishing good; and yet you have, with but little effort, lifted a human soul out of the dark valley of ignorance where it was groping in self-torture, and placed it on an ascending mountain-path. The light of hope has fallen, through your aid, with sunny warmth upon a heart that was cold and barren a little while ago, but is now green with verdure and blossoming in sweet promise of fruit. The infinite years to come alone can reveal the blessings that will flow from this one act of a bed-ridden man, who felt that in him was no capacity for good deeds."

The advantages of a school being placed within the reach of Tom Hicks, he gave up every thought of serious difficulty. His bent, stiff fingers could not be made to hold either pen or pencil in the right position, or to use them in such a way as to make intelligible signs. But Tom was too much in earnest to give up on the first, or second, or third effort. He found, after a great many trials, that he could hold a pencil more firmly than at first, and guide his hand in some obedience to his will. This was sufficient to encourage him to daily long-continued efforts, the result of which was a gradual yielding of the rigid muscles, which became in time so flexible that he could make quite passable figures, and write a fair hand. This did not satisfy him, however. He was ambitious to do better; and so kept on trying and trying, until few boys in the school could give a fairer copy.

"Have you heard the news?" said a neighbor to Mr. Croft, the poor bed-ridden man. It was five years from the day he gave the poor cripple, Tom Hicks, his first lesson.

"What news?" the sick man asked, in a feeble voice, not even turning his head towards the speaker. Life's pulses were running very low. The strong struggle with disease was nearly over.

"Tom Hicks has received the appointment of teacher to our public school."

"Are you in earnest?" There was a mingling of surprise and doubt in the low tones that crept out upon the air.

"Yes; it is true what I say. You know that after Mr. Wilson died, the directors got Tom, who was a favorite with all the scholars, to keep the school together for a few weeks until a successor could be appointed. He managed so well, kept such good order and showed himself so capable as an instructor, that, when the election took place to-day, he received a large majority of votes over a number of highly recommended teachers, and this without his having made application for the situation, or even dreaming of such a thing."

At this moment the cripple's well-known shuffling tread and the rattle of crutches was heard on the stairs. He came up with more than his usual hurry. Croft turned with an effort, so as to get a sight of him as he entered the room.

"I have heard the good news," he said, as he reached a hand feebly toward Tom, "and it has made my heart glad."

"I owe it all to you," replied the cripple, in a voice that trembled with feeling. "God will reward you."

And he caught the shadowy arm, touched it with his lips and wet it with grateful tears, as once before. Even as he held that thin, white hand, the low moving pulses took a lower beat—lower and lower—until the long suffering heart grew still and the freed spirit went up to its reward.

"My benefactor!" sobbed the cripple, as he stood by the wasted form shrouded in grave clothes, and looked upon it for the last time ere the coffin-lid closed over it. "What would I have been except for you?"

Are your opportunities for doing good few or limited in range to all appearance, reader? Have you often said, like the bed-ridden man, "What can I do?" Are you poor, weak, ignorant, obscure, or even sick as he was, and shut out from contact with the busy outside world? No matter. If you have a willing heart, good work will surely come to your hands. Is there no poor, unhappy, neglected one to whom you can speak words of encouragement, or lift out of the vale of ignorance? Think! cast around you. You may, by a single sentence, spoken in the right time and in the right spirit, awaken thoughts in some dull mind that may grow into giant powers in after-time wielded for the world's good. While you may never be able to act directly on society to any great purpose, in consequence of mental or physical disabilities, you may by instruction and guidance, prepare some other mind for useful work, which but for your agency might have wasted its powers in ignorance or crime. All around us are human souls that may be influenced. The nurse who ministers to you in sickness may be hurt or helped by you; the children who look into your face and read it daily—who listen to your speech and remember what you say—will grow better or worse, according to the spirit of your life as it flows into them; the neglected son of a neighbor may find in you the wise counsellor who holds him back from vice. Indeed, you cannot pass a single day, whether your sphere be large or small, your place exalted or lowly, without abundant opportunities for doing good. Only the willing heart is required. As for the harvest, that is nodding ripe for the sickle, in every man's field. What of that time when the Lord of the harvest comes, and you bind up your sheaves and lay them at his feet?

EDUCATION!

THE FIRST QUARTER OF KONA INstitute for 1861, will commence on the Third Monday in March—This Institute, situated in one of the most pleasant and healthful districts known on the Sandwich Islands; removed from all places of vice and idle resort; on a good carriage road, only two miles from Kealakekua Bay, where the favorite new steamer KILAUEA touches semi-monthly, is now open for the English education of HAWAIIAN BOYS (native and alien) boys and girls between the ages of Four and Sixteen years. The Principal has had over fifteen years' experience in teaching nearly every branch of English science—from the Alphabet to the highest branches of Mathematics and Philosophy. He flatters himself to be thoroughly posted in all the latest modes and arts of successful teaching. His plans of teaching have been approved by several Teachers' Institutes in Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts, in which States he has taught for many years. Those who have confided their children to him the past year, and those from a distance who desire to place their sons and daughters under his care and education, may be assured of his constant assiduity and zeal in imparting to them a substantial, useful, practical business education. It will also be his aim to contribute, as much as possible, to the personal happiness, health, physical development and moral success, as well as mental culture of those committed to his care.

Religion for the Times.

We adopt the sentiment of a cotemporary, in commending the following article to the careful consideration of all our readers, and if any of them find the hint applicable to their individual case, let them "put it on." It is from a writer in the Congregationalist, and he describes a religion which the times require in sensible, pointed language:

We want a religion that goes into the family, and keeps the husband from being spiteful when the dinner is late, and keeps the dinner from being late—keeps the wife from fretting when the husband tracks the newly washed floor with his muddy boots, and makes the husband mindful of the scraper and the door-mat—keeps the mother patient when the baby is cross, and keeps the baby pleasant—amuses the children as well as instructs them—wins as well as governs—projects the honey-moon into the harvest moon, and makes the happy hours like the eastern fig tree, bearing in its bosom at once the beauty of the tender blossom and the glory of the ripened fruit. We want a religion that bears heavily, not only on the 'exceeding sinfulness of sin,' but on the exceeding rascality of lying and stealing—a religion that banishes small measures from the counters, small baskets from the stalls, pebbles from the cotton bags, clay from pepper, sand from sugar, chicory from coffee, otter from butter, beet juice from vinegar, alum from bread, strychnine from wine, water from milk cans and buttons from the contribution box.

The religion that is to save world will not put all the big strawberries at the top, and all the bad ones at the bottom. It will not offer more baskets of foreign wines than the vineyards ever produced bottles, and more barrels of flour than all the wheat fields of New York grow and her mills grind. It will not make one half of a pair of shoes of good leather, and the other of poor leather, so that the first shall redound to the maker's credit, and the second to his cash. It will not put Gouvin's stamp on Jenkins' kid gloves, nor make Paris bonnets in the back rooms of a Boston miliner's shop, nor let a piece of velvet that professes to measure twelve yards, come to an untimely end in the tenth, or a spool of sewing silk that vouches for twenty yards, be nipped in the bud at fourteen and a half, nor the cotton thread spool break to the yard stick fifty of the two hundred yards of promise that was given to the eye, nor yard wide cloth measure less than thirty-six inches from selvedge to selvedge, nor all wool delains, and all linen handkerchiefs be amalgamated with clandestine cotton, nor coats made of old woolen rags pressed together, be sold to the unsuspecting public for legal broadcloth. It does not put bricks at five dollars per thousand, into chimneys, it contracted to build of seven dollar materials, smuggle white pine into floors that have paid for hard pine, nor leave yawning cracks in closets, where boards ought to join, nor daub the ceilings that ought to be smoothly plastered, nor make window-blinds with slats that cannot stand the wind, and paint that cannot stand the sun, and fastenings that may be looked at, but are on no account to be touched.

The religion which is to sanctify the world, pays its debts. It does not consider, that forty cents returned for one hundred cents given, is according to law. It looks upon a man who has failed in trade, and who continues to live in luxury, as a thief.—It looks upon a man who promises to pay fifty dollars on demand, with interest, and who neglects to pay it on demand, with or without interest, as a liar.—Port. Trans.
