R. T. DAVIS MILL CO., St. Joseph, Mo.

ONE evening, in the neighborhood of —well, no matter how many years ago, four German officers were eating pate de foie gras and drinking champagne in the common hall of the Maison Rouge at Strasbourg. Eight or ten bottles were empty; the drinkers were rapidly becoming intoxicated. A silent, solemn intoxication, no turbulence of gesture, no pell mell of words, only a dull torpor that ruminated and benumbed.

Suddenly one of the drinkers, who was running a wandering eye over a morning journal spread out before him, uttered a great shout of laughter. His companions turned their heads slowly, with a gesture of automatons moved by a single spring.

"See! see!" cried the laugher, pointing with his finger to the top of a column. And bending forward they read the following sufficiently singular advertisement, as you may see for yourselves:

The Prussian or Bavarian soldier who has reason to believe himself the father of a child born Wednesday, August 8, 18—, at the chateau of M. R. Z. (France), is requested to return to this chateau without delay.

Such a shaking of stomachs and such a gust of tempestuous hilarity as went up then from those mandlin tipplers! But the youngest of the officers, fresh and rosy under his pale blonde curls, and though well into his thirties seeming scarcely five and twenty, had uttered a cry and no longer laughed with the others. He seized the paper and read the advertisement again, read it eagerly, with something like fright in his eyes; then he hastily sprung up and was gone without a word or even a nod.

One month later, the comte de Montrozay, his elbows on his chair arms, his head on his hands, regarded dancing and leaping in the wide chimney the flickering flame of the vine twigs. The autumn was cold and fire was already needed. But the clear sunlight, through the wide opened windows, projected itself into the austere hall, brightened the somber tapestries and furniture, and illuminated the panoplies of arms upon the walls like great steel roses, whilst the winds brought in from the grounds without the moist perfume of the last flowers and the soft gargle of the neighboring river.

Presently there was a rap on the door and a servant entered to announce that a stranger with a German accent demanded to be received.

The comte sprung up hastily. He was very pale in the full light, and a sort of restrained shudder seemed to quiver through the muscles of his face and his close-shut lips. He did not speak, either—fearing, perhaps, to betray his emotion by the trembling of his vbice. He merely nodded his head, but the servant understood—he was to admit the visitor.

When he entered, his manner uneasy, his step uncertain, his whole appearance that of a man who knows

YOU HAVE FIRST TO SETTLE WITH ME—! that he is taking a terrible risk, the comte, smiling benevolently, advanced to meet him.

"Monsieur," said he courteously, "to what do I owe the honor of your visit?"

"I—I read in a paper, monsieur—" began the stranger stammeringly.

The comte still smiled.

"Ah, I see, I know!" said he. "And you think that it is you whom the advertisement concerns? You have, then, I presume, some reason for believing so?"

"Before answering monsieur, may I ask to whom I speak?" returned the other.

"The Comte Gaston de Montrozay, the master of this house, and the only relative and brother of the young girl."

The stranger extended his hands to the comte, as if beseeching him to spare him.

"I am a wretch, monsieur," he cried, "a scoundrel, and if you kill me you would be right. But believe me, I beseech you, believe me, I have had in my heart for ten long months a remorse that has torn and rent me like a wild beast. Of that night, that execrable, accursed night, monsieur, I shall drag the memory to the tomb.

"But you must know, monsieur, you must know everything, and to avow such a crime, to recount it, is of itself a sufficient punishment. We had been fighting all day long in bands, from wood to wood and village, to village, firing into thickets and open doors at random, without seeing or knowing whom we had killed till we heard the groans or saw the blood running at our feet.

"One long continual battle, in a thick night of blinding smoke, the stench of powder and fresh blood and a raging, consuming thirst that would make one drink blood itself if naught else were at hand. By evening I was drunk, drunk with carnage and also with wine, caked with a red mud on face, hands and uniform, and rabid and brutal as a maddened beast.

"It was then that I came upon your house. I recognized it instantly, this hall which I traversed then in a moonlighted shadow, and hear still in my ears the cries of frightened women fleeing before me white as phantoms. One of the them fell. I seized her, clasped her in my arms; I bore her away into another apartment.

"Drunk, drunk and maddened, I repeat, like a beast!

"You know all my crime now, monsieur; dispose of me as you will. When I read that paper, the paper that told me everything, I asked and obtained a conge. I am here. All that you command shall be done—I swear it!"

As the German officer stammered out these last words, a young girl entered the room hurriedly, like a child that has been running, and stopped short, blushing and dismayed by this unexpected presence. Comte Montrozay approached her smiling always, that slight, imperturbable smile.

"My sister," said he, "allow me to present — your name, monsieur, please?"

"Otho Immerman," returned the officer, turning his head abashed and trembling.

"Then, Brigitte, allow me, I repeat, to present to you M. Otho Immerman, who has the honor to demand your hand in marriage, which I have accorded him."

Three days later Otho was still unable to believe in his happiness. The comte, with the smiling courtesy of a good-humored host had offered hospitality.

"Consider yourself in your own house, my guest," said he, adding genially: "Before two weeks have gone you will be my brother, as well, and this chateau, I should tell you, forms part of my sister's dot. Not a word, however, not a word to her of what is past. I command it."

As for Brigitte, she smiled, too, and when the comte had shut himself in his library—his custom every evening—she had remained alone with Otho at the window in the soft half-light of the fading day, listening, responding, element and almost tender.

Ah, but she was pretty and charming! Otho began to love her deeply. He had forgotten everything. No, it was not true that he had forced those doors and windows and entered one night, all bloody and besotted, into that peaceful dwelling and carried away in his arms that swooning girl! It was a lie, a hideous dream! He was betrothed as other young men were betrothed, and he loved her, this beautiful French girl who was soon to be his wife, and the lightest touch of whose little finger filled him with tremulous ecstacy.

He talked to her and told her all about his own country and of the soft myosotis blooms that they called "vergisse-min-neicht," and of the young girls that met their lovers in cemeteries in order to gather from the tombs the eternal flowers of death to guard against human forgetfulness.

He read and sang to her from the poets of his country, and she listened dreamily and sadly and the hours that brought nearer and nearer the longed-for wedding day passed for both of them, apparently in a mutual blossoming of tenderness.

At last it came, that wedding night, and the marriage at the Mairie was over; also the brief ceremony that followed it at the church, and Brigitte de Montrozay had become Mme. Immerman.

Otho, his heart throbbing with joy, was hurrying to the nuptial chamber, when suddenly on the staircase above him a lamp flashed out, a figure stepped from the shadow and a hard voice cried harshly:

"Where are you going sir?"

It was the comte de Montrozay. Otho looked at him smilingly.

"Where?" he repeated, "to the chamber of my wife, of course, monsieur."

"No, sir, not yet," comte de Montrozay returned coldly, "you have first to settle with me. A debt postponed, my friend, is not a debt paid."

And he struck Otho a blow fall in the face.

At daybreak there was a duel behind the chateau and Otho fell, a ball in his brain.

There was none to ask questions and no one to find fault. The marriage and the quarrel had been equally quiet. An alleged quarrel over the wine cups was certainly reason enough for the disappearance of a single German officer in the enemy's country. Now the peasants who labor on the Montrozay grounds and the vagabonds of the roads often see through the bars of the gate Mme. Otho Immerman, a young widow whose mourning garments are still new, smiling and dancing in the sunlight a white and rosy babe whose hair is yellow as spun gold and whose eyes are blue as the myosotis blooms that they call the vergisse-mein-nicht in Germany.

The debt was paid, but the babe was fatherless, and the young widow smiles only when the babe—her little Otho she calls it, in spite of her brother's frowning protest—is in her her arms.

Chinese Alligators.

It seems strange, but it is a fact, nevertheless, that the Chinese alligator, which has long been supposed to be extinct, has been rediscovered and specimens of it sent to the Royal zoological gardens at London. Marco Polo was, I believe, the last author to describe it. In his description he mentions a curious superstition, viz: that its gall was a specific for the cure of hydrophobia.
