A LESSON IN REVENGE.

SEATED in the bay window of Mrs. Darsey's spacious drawing-room, Cyril Delmar was telling Helen Darsey that he loved her, and wanted her for his wife. And just outside the window, through whose open, lace-draped casement, the odor of night jasmine crept like incense, and the moon shone down in a flood of silvery light, Vivian Ames listened to his words with a crushed and bleeding heart; his love words to another. For, until to-night, Vivian believed he loved her, and that "some day—some sweet day"—he would tell her so, in words, even as his eyes had already spoken. Love needs no spoken assurance; a glance of the eye—swift and soulful—a touch of the hand—all speak with mute tongues; but Love knows and comprehends, and is glad.

Two months ago, Cyril Delmar had made the acquaintance of the Darseys, and the poor relation, Vivian Ames. It had been quite a romantic affair. He had come to this suburban place one beautiful June morning—had ridden on horseback—for the purpose of visiting a certain estate adjoining the Darsey place. It was a fine property, and, being in the market, Cyril had made up his mind that it was just the home for him, whenever he should see fit to take to himself a wife.

He was twenty-eight, handsome, and would eventually be quite a matrimonial "catch." For his uncle, Richard Clyde, was a millionaire and a bachelor, and Cyril was reputed to be his prospective heir. The old millionaire was past seventy, and made no secret of the fact that his nephew would some day inherit his fortune.

Now, that fair June morning, as Cyril Delmar rode gayly along the straight smooth road which led past Mrs. Darsey's house, he did not dream that his fate lay in ambush just beyond.

Right in front of the high-arched iron gates, his horse took fright and threw him violently to the ground. It was just like a scene from a novel, so Helen Darsey had declared, with her big blue eyes full of delight, not at the thought of the young man's sufferings, of course, but because it was all like a story or a play. The handsome hero was carried into the Darsey house by two men servants, and placed upon a sofa, while Mrs. Darsey, a tall, elegant woman dressed like a fashion plate, sent at once for their family physician. Arrived there, that dignitary soon pronounced the young man's injuries painful. He must have rest and care for a week or two.

To say that Cyril Delmar took an unfair advantage of the situation to remain an invalid as long as possible, would not be quite untrue. Who could blame him? For both Helen and her cousin Vivian were constantly at his side, to read to him, sing to him, converse with him. Somehow he seemed to prefer Vivian's society. A slight, pale girl, with great dark eyes, and a low, sweet voice. And as time went by, there grew up within her heart a love which soon was strong enough to crowd out all else. She cared nothing for the wealth; she loved him for himself alone.

But Helen Darsey had "an eye to the main chance," and had he been poor, Cyril Delmar would have had a small prospect of success.

The days passed and Vivian's love grew and increased in depth and strength, until it was her all. She lived for nothing else.

In the meantime old Mr. Clyde had frequently called upon his nephew, and saw with satisfaction that he was greatly interested in Vivian. For somehow, poor and dependent though she was, she touched the old man's heart, and he preferred that his nephew's choice should be Vivian Ames.

Cyril led her on and on to believe herself beloved; he had said everything that a lover might say except to ask her to become his wife, when, all at once, a change came over him. He seemed to avoid Vivian. There were no more tete-a-tetes—no more tender looks and words.

Cyril was quite recovered now, and the coveted home had been purchased, but though he and his uncle resided there, Cyril passed most of his time with the Darseys.

Vivian grew thin and pale, and there was a look of sadness in her dark eyes which had never been there before. And now to-night—the night my story opens—she had received the blow which broke her heart. At least, she thought that it was broken; but hearts are, fortunately, not so easily crushed, or most mortals would be condemned to heart-break. For we all get a blow sometime; and well it is that the average human heart is elastic, and springs back into place again, even after a heavy sorrow has crushed down upon it.

Standing outside the window that night Vivian listened, because she could not help it. She heard Cyril's words:

"I love you, Helen! Will you be my wife? Understand me—this is not the first, best love of my heart that I offer you—but—you know my sad story, and if you can overlook all that, and help me to forget, and be my wife, Helen, we will try to be happy!"

And Vivian's heart had grown cold, but she whispered to herself that better no love at all, than a half-hearted love like that. He had deceived her. It was bitter, it was hard, but it was true. With a heart swelling with indignation she turned away. And there, right at her side, she saw old Mr. Clyde, gazing down into the small, pale face, with eyes full of sadness. He, too, had overheard the interesting love scene.

"Vivian!" he said, softly, taking the girl's cold hands in his own, "we have unintentionally played eavesdroppers! I am not sorry, for I have thus learned the truth and my nephew's real nature. He is a dishonorable fellow! Vivian, listen! Do you want revenge for his treatment of you? I acknowledge that I am burning to punish him, for he has been guilty of a cruel wrong to you. Everybody has believed that you and he would marry, until lately, when he has devoted himself to that wax doll, Helen Darsey. Do you want revenge, Vivian?"

She glanced into his face, all a-tremble. Her eyes shone like stars. Did she? Would any woman in her place—cast aside, made light of—as she had been—wish revenge for her wrongs?

"Do I?" she faltered, "tell me, tell me—how!"

He clasped her trembling hands.

"Marry me!" he whispered. "I am old enough to be your father, dear; but I would be good and kind to you, and I shall not live long. When I die you will have all—all! Vivian, do you hear me?"

She started and turned pale.

"And—Cyril?" she whispered.

The old man smiled grimly.

"That is my affair. I have an idea that there is a surprise in store for you, Vivian. Only say yes, and I will do the rest."

"Yes."

That was all. The old man's face wore a satisfied look; he bent his gray head and touched the girl's forehead with his lips.

"Heaven bless you, my dear," he said. But Vivian was not happy. She had accepted the offer of revenge upon Cyril Delmar for his perfidy; accepted it when thrust in her hands in this strange way; but her heart was heavy and troubled. "Revenge is sweet," says the old adage, but Vivian did not find it so.

The next morning old Richard Clyde called upon Mrs. Darsey, and electrified that lady by asking her sanction to his marriage with Vivian Ames.

"Mr. Clyde!" gasped Mrs. Darsey, almost unable to speak—"why! this is overwhelming! I thought you would never marry, and that Cyril is—is——"

"My heir in prospective? Ay, so he is—in case I do not marry. All men reserve the right to change their condition, Mrs. Darsey."

"Then, of course, if Delmar is not to be your heir he cannot marry my daughter!" stormed Mrs. Darsey, wrathfully.

An odd smile touched the old man's bearded lip. But he said nothing.

In the meantime, out in the grounds, Vivian had encountered Cyril Delmar. She walked straight up to him, and extended her hand.

"Allow me to congratulate you," she was beginning; but something in the sad, dark eyes fixed upon her face made her hesitate.

"Vivian!" (in a choked voice), "do not mock me! I would not have asked Helen to be my wife but for your cruel conduct."

"Explain yourself!" she demanded, haughtily. He grew pale.

"Why! are you not engaged to be married to a gentleman in the West?" he asked. "Helen told me so, and—and—Vivian——"

He stopped short, surprised at the look upon her face.

I see, she faltered. "Oh, Cyril, it is false—false! Helen has told you a wicked falsehood!"

His face grew dark.

"And she has inveigled me into asking her to marry me!" he groaned. "Oh, Vivian! I have loved you—you alone—ever since the first day I met you!"

Just then, Mr. Clyde appeared. His face wore a look of satisfaction.

"My little plot has worked admirably!" he cried. "As soon as Mrs. Darsey and her daughter learned that I had asked Vivian to be my wife, and thus virtually disinherit you Cyril, the engagement between you and Helen Darsey ceased to exist."

Cyril fell back amazed.

"Have—you—asked—Vivian to be—your wife, Uncle Richard? he faltered.

"Why, Vivian loves me!"

"I know it! And I knew that there was some underhand work going on, on the part of Helen Darsey. I got Vivian's consent to marry me while she was piqued and half-wild over your conduct. I knew that when I announced my engagement, Helen Darsey would throw you over and at the same time all the hidden plot which has parted you and Vivian would come to light. I can only say, 'Bless ye, my children!'"

And so Cyril Delmar won his wife. And Vivian, remembering how she had grasped at the proffered revenge, felt a deep feeling of remorse. Revenge may be sweet, but Vivian Delmar cares naught for its sweetness. There is nothing in the world, she says, one half so sweet as love.
