SCOTT & BAKER.

It is a hot summer evening in July, 1795, and the setting sun is looming sullenly through the rolling smoke that covers the field of Kunersdorf.

The fiercest battle of the Seven Years' war has been fought and lost; and for the third time since the great struggle began the cause of Prussia seems wrecked beyond redemption.

Of 48,000 men who gathered around the standards of Frederick the Great this morning barely 3,000 remain together.

Marshal Soltikoff is scribbling on a drumhead his triumphant dispatch to the Empress Elizabeth: "Your majesty's enemies are annihilated," and Frederick himself, with despair in his heart and a hand clenched convulsively upon the little phial of poison which is his last resource against adverse fortune, is galloping wildly hither and thither in a fruitless effort to rally his beaten host.

Could anyone have shown to the despairing king at that bitter moment a vision of his "annihilated" Prussia as she should be a century later, with Russia cowering her ally, France and Austria prostrate at her feet, he would have been sorely amazed; but for the time the greatness of her present peril hides the splendor of her coming deliverence.

And well it may; for one glance at the field of battle suffices to show that all is lost.

The batteries stormed so irresistibly this morning are once more crowded with white-coated Austrian grenadiers.

The dark blue mass of the Prussian column is ebbing back in a thousand scattered streams like a broken wave, the long white lines of the Austrian battalions overlapping it like wreaths of spray; while gray and shadowy in the background loom the vast masses of the Russian infantry, rallying for the second time with the stubborn courage of their race to victory and to vengeance.

Last in the field, as the swarming destroyers came raging on, stand two battalions of Prussian guards—a little islet of stout manhood in that roaring sea of ruin.

They are prepared to die, if die they must; but at least they will sell their lives dearly. And so they do.

Loudon's dragoons on the right, Bathyanni's hussars on the left, storm in upon them like a whirlwind, but all in vain.

Falling fast on every side, the indomitable handful still close sternly up to make up good their impregnable square.

Firm as ever looms out the line of grim faces behind their hedge of steel, from which bursts ever and anon the flash and crack of the fatal musketry; while all around the gay dresses of the splendid horsemen swept down by scores at every volley strew the trampled earth far and wide.

"Courage, children!" cried the cheery voice of the Prussian colonel. "Hold out but a little longer, and our king is safe."

But such a struggle is too unequal to last.

For now the Russians coming up in their mighty fall upon the devoted square, and break it by shear weight of overwhelming numbers; and now it is all one frantic hurly-burly of hand-to-hand fight, one welter of stab bing bayonets and pounding musket-butts, such as modern warfare has seldom seen.

Amid the maddening din and confusion of the final struggle a few brave men gather around the king, and hold the swarming assailants at bay while he mounts the horse of a staff officer, his own having been killed.

At that moment a shower of bullets comes pelting into the midst of the little group.

A tall Pomeranian throws himself in front of the king, and receives one of the balls full on the breast.

Is he dead?

No—it has pierced his uniform, but beneath lies the steel case that holds his mother's miniature, against which the bullet flattened itself.

He staggers with the shock, but does not fall.

"Are you hurt?" asked Frederick, bending from his saddle to look at him.

"Not a whit, sire," answered the officer cheerily, holding up the flattened bullet.

"What's your name?"

"Captain Hasfeldt of the —th dragoons, if it please your majesty."

"Good," says the king. "I shall not forget you, Colonel Hasfeldt, if Prussia and I survive this day. Come, gentlemen, there is nothing more for us to do here."

And turning his horse he rides hastily off the lost battlefield.

Years have come and gone, and the Seven Years' war is over, and Prussia is safe, and Frederick, busied with the overwhelming labor of replacing the ruin which the great struggle has wrought—rebuilding burned villages, replanting ravaged fields, bringing order out of disorder, extending national trade, promoting national education—fails to notice the careworn look and increasing shabbiness of a certain Colonel Hasfeldt, who is on duty at the palace of Potsdam.

And in truth the veteran's look may well be anxious and his uniform faded.

Scanty as are his means, he has narrowed them still more by assisting his old comrades in their need, and now trouble after trouble has fallen upon him.

Money is short, his wife is ill, and he, in order to supply his wants has sold or pawned one by one what few valuables he possesses.

At last nothing is left but the old silver watch which has been his companion in so many battles, and over it he hesitates long, for he knows that the methodical king likes to see every officer with his watch about him, and he is fond of asking the hour.

But money must be had, and the watch has to go.

However, the chain is still left, and in order to keep it in its place, the veteran attaches to it the flattened bullet of Kunersdorf, which he still preserves as a relic.

Thus equipped, and with the same stately bearing as ever, but hiding a very sore heart beneath his torn uniform, the old man goes up to the palace.

Now, as ill-luck will have it, just as he comes up the steps the chain gets loose and drags out the bullet along with it.

He puts it hastily back, hoping that no one has noticed it; but unhappily there is at that moment looking out of an adjoining window the very last man whom he would have wished to see him—a French wit who is on a visit to the king.

Fond of mischief as a monkey, and rejoicing in every opportunity of making other people look foolish, the malicious jester looks upon this involuntary betrayal of poverty as a first-rate joke, and hurries off to tell the king.

"Your majesty," says he, "when Colonel Hasfeldt comes in just ask him what time it is, and you'll see something comical."

The king looked rather stern, perhaps feeling conscience-stricken at the sudden remembrance, of his old servant's careworn face, and the little notice he had lately taken of him.

But just at that moment came the colonel.

"Are you not a little late this morning, colonel?" asked Frederick, "but with your watch, and let me see what time it is."

The old soldier saw in a moment by the Frenchman's spiteful grin the snare that had been laid for him, but he faced the trial like a man.

Without hesitating a moment he pulled out the flattened ball, and holding it up to the king, said quietly:

"This watch, sire, keeps but one time—it tells me that I must be ready at any hour to die for our majesty."

Frederick shot a glance at the malicious Frenchman, before which the latter recoiled as from a blow, and then taking off his watch, said with a look of emotion rarely seen on that iron face:

"Take this, my old comrade, as the gift not of your king but of your friend, and to morrow you shall see that I have not forgotten the field of Kunersdorf."

And sure enough the very next morning Colonel Hasfeldt received a pension which made him comfortable for life.

Chinese and Cockroaches.

One of the strangest superstitions of Chinamen is the awe with which they regard the cockroach. John holds the ugly black pest as something sacred, claiming that it is especially favored by the gods and a particular favorite of the great joss. The most unfortunate mishap that can befall a Chinaman is to step on a cockroach. Instantly visions of terrible disasters and calamities rise before him. In some instances the superstition has been known to prey so on the minds of the celestials as to drive them insane. As a result of this state of affairs Chinatown is overrun with cockroaches, and a Chinaman would as soon think of killing himself as of killing one of them.

A Character.

The following response was made to an inquiry of a character witness in a suit in Wilkes county, N. C.: Question—Do you know the general character of F ——? Answer—I do. Question—What is it? Answer—Well, passing and re-passing, entertaining and being entertained, in a social point of view, it is good; but in matters of business, where he is financially interested, and especially in winding up dead men's estates, his character is bad."

Another Three.

Some one has said that the three hardest words to pronounce consecutively are, "I was mistaken." Let the person who believes this assertion try his articulating powers on the names of the lakes in the state of Maine—three, for instance—Hulmatcabob, Zitzmornumgobig, Mahogapraggobagg.

Catarrh

AND

COLD IN THE HEAD

relieved instantly by one application of

Birney's Catarrh Powder

REV. FATHER CLARKE, formerly of the St. Roy Bishop of Columbus, Ohio, writes:

OPINIONS—Extract from one letter. It has relieved me of a most distressing catarrh of many years standing. Am delighted with it. Am sending some to my friends. The good results from its use cannot be exaggerated. I feel it my duty to recommend it to all who suffer from catarrh. I will do anything in reason to help introduce it among my friends.

M. H. Fleming, Chemistry D. S. Appleton's House, Chicago, writes:

Gentlemen—Have been equipped for a number of years and with perhaps as much money as any man in the world, I have spent more money than I care to mention in the hope of finding a remedy for catarrh. Your Birney's Catarrh Powder has done me more good than all the other things I have taken. I have found it a positive cure. Its effects are lasting. I have not had a cold since I used your powder. I have never heard of a case where it has failed to cure. Yours truly, M. H. Fleming.

*Boxes south of river.

Fire alarms are sounded upon the first bell at department headquarters by striking the number of the signal station nearest the fire, in the manner: If the box is in the direct circuit and repeated, it for box 12, one stroke, a short pause, then three strokes and repeated, thus, 1-111, 1-111, etc. "22" is sounded for all fires within the district bounded by Fifth, Ninth, Jackson and Quincy streets.

THE STROKES are sounded and repeated, followed by the number of the signal station nearest the fire, as THE SECOND ALARM—for a serious fire.

THE 8 STROKES, followed by FOR ENGINES and repeated, is the SECOND ALARM for a very dangerous fire and calls out the entire department within a distance of points.

TWO STROKES, slowly, indicates FIRE TO THE SOUTH of river. Three strokes, from state, FIRE NORTH of river.
