MY STRANGE PATIENT.

ABOUT two years ago there came to me a tall, handsome fellow, who gave the name of George Griffiths. He had a fearless eye, a cheerful, even genial expression, an exceptionally well moulded, aquiline nose, and a splendid mustache, trimmed and tended, evidently, with scrupulous care. There was no obvious reason; certainly, why he should require my services; there was no possibility of making him better looking.

"I hear that you are a specialist in dermatology," he began, after I had greeted him with the usual formality.

I admitted the soft impeachment.

"Well," he went on, "I want you to perform a surgical feat on me. I want my nose altered."

I expressed surprise, and assured him that, in my humble opinion, his nose was best let alone. But he disputed this proposition, and insisted that he had reasons for being weary of the aquiline, and for craving a proboscis as unlike as possible to that with which nature had endowed him. Seeing my curiosity, and possibly not wishing to be deemed a madman, he proceeded to explain them to me.

"After several years roughing it in Texas," he said, "I came back rich, and there is nothing to prevent my enjoying myself but the pestering attentions of relatives whom I had hoped to have done with forever when I went abroad. But I cannot escape them or their importunities, and so, however eccentric you may think me, I must enlist your services. I presume there is no danger in the operation?"

"No danger," I replied, accepting his explanation as that of an eccentric man, whose affairs, after all, were no business of mine, "and very little pain—practically none, in fact. But you must keep indoors for a few days after it is over. When and where shall I call upon you?"

"Could you not operate here, and now?" he asked.

"Impossible. Your journey home would not be without great risk."

"But could I not stay here? Could you not accommodate me for the short time necessary? Doctor, I could and would pay you liberally for the service. Consider, if I go home, my identity would be again revealed to those from whom I desire to conceal it."

This speech, one would have thought, would have aroused my suspicion, but it did not. The man's frank and open expression disarmed me entirely, and I could but look upon him as I had done previously, simply as an eccentric individual. It so happened I had a spare room. I could not regard the question of remuneration with indifference, and so, to cut a long story short, I consented.

For the purpose of more conveniently operating, I suggested, somewhat timidly, the sacrifice of his beautiful mustache. To my surprise, he assented eagerly, and was for the application of scissors and razor forthwith. You would scarcely credit the difference the removal of this artistic hirsute appendage—"the crop of many years," as he jokingly described it—made to my patient. It displayed what had been concealed before, his mouth, and the sinister expression of this was such as to effectually nullify the honest gentility of his upper face. In fact the removal of his mustache constituted, as I told him, a sufficient disguise to baffle any number of inquisitive relatives. But he insisted on the nasal operation, nevertheless. His motto was evidently "thorough."

Well, I performed it, and when, six days later, Mr. George Griffiths left my house, with nothing but a rapidly healing and almost invisible scar to blemish the straight nose which now adorned his face, I would have wagered my case of instruments to a twopenny penknife that the most observant of his previous acquaintances would never have recognized him.

About a week after my eccentric patient's departure, the particulars, so far as they were known, of a remarkably brutal murder were made public. The body of a lady named Bates, evidently stabbed to death, had been discovered in a house in a London suburb, where she had resided with her husband, who had now disappeared, and whose portrait and description were now freely circulated by the police. A brief amount of attention to these published details was sufficient to convince me that my patient, Mr. George Griffiths, was the criminal.

I lost no time in communicating what I knew to the authorities, by whom, it must be said, my story was received with some incredulity. You see, my special branch of surgery is but little known to the public, and it was the opinion of the police that the murderer had left the country some time before Mr. Griffiths had quitted my house.

But, a few months ago, happening to be on a visit to Dresden, whither I had gone on a brief summer holiday—and having in a way largely succeeded in dismissing from my mind the events above related—I was startled to see, seated at the table in the Gewerbehaus in that city, enjoying the strains of the talented orchestra, my no longer mysterious but now dreadful acquaintance, Mr. George Griffiths!

My duty, I decided after a moment's reflection, was plain—to denounce and deliver him to the authorities.

Quickly, therefore, lest he should leave before I could have him arrested, I explained myself as well as I was able to the nearest official. He looked and was unbelieving. So, too, were the others whom he summoned to hear my story. That part of it which referred to the operation was received with a smile; and the upshot of it was so far from effecting my ex-patient's capture, I was myself lightly ridiculed as a mad Englishman.

But I could not allow myself to be baffled in what I considered my clear duty, viz., to deliver a foul murderer up to justice. I determined, therefore, to renew my acquaintance with him there and then, to give him no inkling of my knowledge of the truth, and to communicate once more with the English police, while continuing to keep him under my own surveillance in the Saxon capital.

When, with a polite bow, I approached and spoke to him, he recognized me at once; I could see that, though at first he pretended not to know me. We had a glass of beer together, and spoke of many matters of general interest, I flattering myself that nothing in my conversation or bearing gave him the slightest ground to suspect me.

The same night I wrote a long letter to the London police, again stating my certain knowledge that this man, changed though he was, was the murderer of Mrs. Bates, and suggesting that they should forthwith send over to Dresden an official armed with information as to other distinguishing marks on Mr. Bates' person besides his aquiline nose and heavy mustache.

During the next few days I became very intimate with my ex-patient, and in pursuance of a scheme I had formed, invited him more than once to bathe with me from one of the floating baths. This he cheerfully did, being an admirable swimmer. On the fifth day from my writing to London an answer arrived in the person of a stalwart detective from Scotland Yard, who informed me that the real Mr. Bates had, as I suspected, the distinguishing marks which could be verified; among them an anchor tattooed on the left forearm which I had myself, of course, noted whilst we were bathing together. To satisfy himself, before acting on the warrant he had brought with him, the detective, Mr. Hanway, it was agreed, should join our bathing party on the morrow—a simple and not disagreeable preliminary to the contemplated arrest.

But alas! for the schemes of mice and men! We called together at Mr. Griffith's—alias Bates' rooms—in the morning, and found him busy with some correspondence. "If you will wait for me half an hour or so on the terrace," he said, "which your friend will find very pleasant, I'll join you for our swim in about half an hour." Suspecting nothing, we took our leave—and waited for him as he had directed.

But we waited in vain. Whether the features of my friend, Mr. Hanway, were known to him, or whether there had, in spite of my care, been anything in my manner to excite his suspicion, I cannot say. Suffice it, that we remained a full hour on the terrace, and then returned to find him—gone!

Whither, we could never trace, and I have never seen him since. From that day to this he has baffled the skill of the police of two countries, and it is my belief that if he be still alive he has again persuaded some guileless surgeon to operate on him, and once more alter the outline of his features beyond recognition.

Filling a Long-Felt Want.

Wolff Brothers, of Kreuznach, have patented and put on the market a mute violin for the use of beginners on that instrument which removes the annoyance caused to listeners by the constant exercises of musical neighbors. The violin consists only of a mahogany frame without top or bottom. In every other way it is built like a violin. This unique instrument is not entirely mute, however, but produces an exceedingly soft tone, audible only to the player. The sound is decidedly pure withal, as only in this way can it be of real value to students.

Eccentric Literary Tastes.

From the Boston public library come some queer stories about persons of eccentric literary tastes. One woman has taken out a volume of sermons every Friday for years (she does not care what the religious views of the writers are), and then on each succeeding Monday a novel "to unbend her mind again." Another wants only novels that have clergymen as their chief characters, and there is one old maid that cannot be induced to read any work written by a woman.

Little Bessie—Let's play we're a married couple keeping house. Ethel—All right, but you must be the husband. Ma says I ain't strong enough to stand punishment.

Catarrh AND COLD IN THE HEAD

relieved instantly by one application of

Birney's Catarrh Powder

REV. ESTEBAN CRANDALL, writes from the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Columbus, Ohio, writes:

Gentlemen:—I cannot say enough for your Powder. It has cured me of an aggravated attack of catarrh which I thought would result in deafness. Am delighted with it. All my friends in Columbus and Indianapolis are quite enthusiastic over it. The good it does seems most astonishing. Three members of the clergy located under the cards. I will be happy to refer a sufferer to me if the remedy is only what it is represented to be.

M. E. Fairchild, Guideline U. S. Appraiser's Stores, Chicago, writes:

Gentlemen:—Being simply entirely deaf for a number of years with and nothing to relief from catarrh, I applied your remedy. I tried, you remember, a dollar's worth to try it. Result was so satisfactory that I now have a month's supply. It takes hold of justice. Thus my ear. Those years it has prevented total deafness and have recommended it to one in need of it to friends and can say I have never heard of a case where it has failed to relieve.

*Boxes north of river.

Fire alarms are sounded upon the tower bell at department headquarters by striking the number of the signal station nearest the fire, in this manner: If for box 4, four distinct strokes and repeated, if for box 12, one stroke, a short pause, then three strokes, and repeated, thus, 1-111, 1-111, etc. "22" is sounded for all fires within the district bounded by Fifth, Ninth, Jackson and Quincy streets.

TEN STROKES, and repeated, followed by the number of the signal station nearest the fire, in the SECOND STORY for assistance.

THREE STROKES, followed by the CALL, and repeated, is the GENERAL ALARM for a very dangerous fire, and calls out the entire department with a detail of police.

TWO STROKES, slowly, indicates EMERGENCY. One long whistle from water works for fires south of river. Three whistles from same, for fires north of river.

Burns are absolutely painless when De Witt's Witch Hazel Salve is promptly applied. This statement is true. A perfect remedy for skin diseases, chapped hands and lips, and never fails to cure piles. J. R. Jones.
