THE BRIGHTON POISONER.

THE Smithsonian Wax Works exhibition was doing uncommonly well. And never in the history of this superb organization had it deserved to do any better, as the figures were never more numerous or recherche. They were six in all, to say nothing of the tattooed man, who served not only in his own spotted capacity, but came in handy during the war dance at the evening performance. The show was drawing full houses, and the cards informing the public of the educational nature of the collection always drew the members of the ladies' schools in such large numbers that it was found necessary to change part of the collection of "horrors" into kings and queens to please the scholastic tastes of these patrons.

The tent was pitched near the end of town—the town of Galilee, one of those wild California places where all is one vast wilderness of innocence. Never had Daniel in his den, which was the chief moving tableaux, worked to better advantage; and the lions responded to the clockwork as if it had just been placed inside them. The Tichborne Claimant—and what a lot of wax that figure absorbed, to be sure!—was an object of much attention, and with the working-class audience was almost as popular as Daniel.

But all this is neither here nor there. The troupe had been at Galilee a week. We were sitting down to supper after the close of the exhibition for the day. When I say "we" I mean the tattooed man (whose appetite was not affected by his singular marking), myself (Henry Jameson, the sole proprietor), Mrs. Jameson and Miss Ethel Jane Jameson, our only child. Well, we were sitting out in front of the wagons—for it was summer time—enjoying our meal of tripe and onions, when suddenly I noticed a form approaching in the dim twilight. It was that of a young man.

When he stepped out into the glow of the lamp he stood hesitating, apparently wondering whether or not he should advance any further, and I could see in the faint light of the lamp that he was not the most handsome or intellectual young man in the world. His forehead came bulging out under his hat, and his eyes were large and watery, and there was a vacant look in his face. Still he seemed harmless, so I beckoned to him and said:

"Good evening, sir. What can we do for you?"

Before he could answer my wife broke in:

"Why, that's the young man who has been in every time the tent was open to-day, and wanted to know if he could have a season ticket."

By that time he had come closer, and, smelling the supper, he said: "There, I'm disturbing you; but, if you please, will the wax works be opened up to-night?"

The tattooed man who had been encored frequently toward the end of the evening looked savage at the thought, but I winked at him to say nothing. Then I said to the young man:

"Well, as the tattooed man and Daniel and the lions are sleepy, and the people about here seem to have turned in, I'm sure you wouldn't ask us to stay open just for you?"

"Me!" he said quite energetically. "Certainly not. But tell me, Mr. Jameson, does she sleep?" and he came up quite close and whispered in my ear.

"MY CHRISTINE, SPEAK; SAY THAT YOU LOVE ME."

"Mean'ng who, sir?" said I.

"Can you ask?" he replied in a melancholy tone. "Why, Christine, of course, my angel, my love!" and he leaned over to the tattooed man and exclaimed hoarsely: "And you, Mr. Wild Indian, do you love?"

He's a touchy sort, that tattooed one, and there might have been trouble had I not signaled to Mrs. Jameson to give him more tripe and onions. Then I looked at the young man. His eyes were rolling wildly and his forehead seemed to bulge more than ever. I felt that I must dissemble.

"Christine does sleep," I murmured sadly; then, turning to Mrs. Jameson, asked in an undertone what he meant.

"Oh, it's that figure of Princess Louise that we've dressed up and labeled for the Brighton Poisoner," she replied. "I found him kissing it this afternoon." The young man was standing gazing at the covered wagon and whistling plaintively.

"Could I see her," he asked presently, "before I seek my couch? I will not wake her, but just kiss the bed clothes and retire."

It was awkward to leave my supper like this, but there was determination in his watery eye and a half dollar in his fingers.

"Follow me," I said; and I led the way into the tent with the solitary lamp, leaving the tattooed man and my wife and daughter outside in the growing darkness. He was a bit timid following me into the tent, which smelt strongly of stale sawdust and orange peel. And no wonder, for the figures were all wrapped in sheets and looked ghostly. The Brighton Poisoner stood between the Claimant and Bantes. At my caller's request I withdrew the sheet that covered the Poisoner.

"Withdraw awhile, Jameson," he said. "I should like to be alone with my Christine." That was his own name for her. He slipped the half-dollar into my hand, and I left him in the loneliness of the tent.

Early on the following morning, the tattooed man, who slept on a folding cot near Daniel's den, ran to my bedside and awoke me with the startling information that the show had been robbed. I knew that we could not afford to lose any of the valuables in our collection, and, without waiting to dress myself, I followed the tattooed man. Sure enough, he was not mistaken, for when my eyes rested on the spot where the Brighton Poisoner had stood from day to day, there was nothing left but the small wooden pedestal, and the absence of the figure seemed to give the place a most gruesome appearance.

Beside the pedestal I noticed that the sawdust had been greatly disturbed, and after a moment's study I found the place where someone had dragged the figure under the canvass. Like a hungry bloodhound I started on all fours under the canvass. My hopes were not dismayed, for I could see the trail clearly—the foot of the figure had made a sharp cut in the ground and the footsteps of the thief were clearly visible in the soft, brown soil. So I followed the trail until I was almost broken down with fatigue. Over beds of moss, over banks of wild flowers, along solitary cattle paths, under chaparral so thick that I could only force my way through it, down into damp canons, over hillsides and along fertile meadows the miscreant had dragged the leading feature of my show. I must have followed his trail for nearly three miles, when I came to a deep canon. The footprints and the cut made by the foot were plainer than ever, and as I entered this ravine I noticed at its bend reflecting all the glories of God's early morning, a beautiful waterfall. It fell from the mountainside, seemingly as silent as the breath from a maiden's lips, and all that told of its life were the silvery beads of spray thrown off in its fall. With my eyes full opened by the marvelous wonders of the dream of nature, I forgot all about wife, child, tattooed man and performing lion, and rushed to meet it as a child hastens to find the end of a rainbow. Imagine my astonishment when I pushed through a thicket of young willows and saw the young man of the night before standing on a log that protruded from the bank and stretched out over the boiling pool at the foot of the fall. He looked like a maniac with his disheveled hair and wild staring eyes. The Brighton Poisoner was clasped to his heart with a strong grasp, and he was uttering some inaudible words, with his right hand outstretched to heaven. But I inferred that he had come to this wild spot to perform an incantation and supplicate the Almighty on his behalf.

The diaphanous dress of the figure was trailing in the water. She looked as fair and queenly as ever, but the stare in her glassy eyes was awful to behold.

How he managed to stand on that trembling log was as much a part of the mystery as everything else. The wavelets caused by the fall were strong enough to keep it moving very unsteadily.

"What are you doing there?" I cried.

He turned and looked at me. Both arms embraced the figure with a death-like tightness.

"No, no, you shall not take her! Go back! Go back!" How wildly he looked at me. Then kissing the cold wax face he said: "My Christine, speak! say that you love me!"

I could stand no more of this, for I realized the peril of the figure. I rushed for the log, intending to recover the figure and return with it to the wagon, but in my haste my foot slipped and pushed the log with its lovers into the stream.

Horror of horrors! I saw it caught by the waves of the boiling pool and glide slowly toward the downpouring torrent. I could not swim, and I was utterly powerless. Two minutes more and all would be over.

The young man must have seen his danger. But he stood erect on the log, and as it was drawing him more swiftly toward his death, I heard him cry aloud: "God! Hell! Christine! We shall die together. We are going! going! Come, love, speak before we die! Kiss me! kiss me! dar—"

That end of the log on which he stood rose high in the mist-laden sunshine, as the other felt the impact of the fall, and then the Brighton Poisoner and her mad lover plunged to the bottom of the stream.—San Francisco News-Letter.

If Atmosphere Were 700 Miles Thick.

According to our old natural philosophers the height our atmosphere extends above the surface of the earth does not exceed forty-five miles. The speculative writers say that if it were possible that this could be suddenly increased to 700 the sun's rays could not penetrate it and we would all freeze to death while grappling around in the darkness blacker than the blackest Egyptian midnight.
