The British schooner Shelby, taken by the U S Revenue Cutter Richard Rush in the Behring Sea last month was found without the necessary number of gun shells on board and was turned over to the English cruiser Pheasant. The shortage in the official and recorded amount of shells proved that they had been used in the sea, presumably in killing seals, and the Shelby's work was cut short, for the season at least. The E B Marvin had several skins that showed shot-holes and, being British, was also turned over to the Pheasant for transfer to Victoria. The officers of the Rush state as an undeniable indication that the seal herds are rapidly decreasing that in many places at the rookeries the grass is growing luxuriantly where once countless numbers of seals resorted themselves, the "hauling-up" localities or spots where the animals go ashore always being bare, sandy wastes from the visits of the herds.
