STORY OF ACHIEVEMENT BEHIND LAUNCHING OF STAR-BULLETIN

BULLETIN'S VIGOROUS GROWTH

Starting as Shipping Sheet, It Rapidly Forged Straight to the Front

On the first day of February, 1882, the first printed copy of the "Daily Bulletin" was posted on the outside walls of the "Honolulu Hale," by the firm of J. W. Robertson & Co., whose place of business was there at that time. That first issue of the Daily Bulletin was ten by fifteen inches in size, and printed on only one side of the sheet.

Herewith is given a facsimile of that first issue, and it will be noticed that the merchants of that early day as well as those of the present day, were in no wise backward in using the Bulletin as a medium for business publicity.

When the daily printed issue of the Bulletin was inaugurated the proprietors of the sheet were the subjects of jeers and jokes by their many friends, who predicted that it would be a sort of novelty for a short time and would then fall by the wayside. Still, despite the sneers and jokes, the Bulletin was a success from the start, and Mr. Robertson himself confessed that he did not expect the sheet "would amount to much." As new ideas occurred to him he flashed them on the public, and this paper was one of them. The posting of the Daily Bulletin was at first a novelty, but it soon became a feature of the city's life. The people enjoyed reading the posted editions, and it was not long until Mr. Robertson received suggestions that it would be the biggest kind of a business move on his part if he would distribute copies of the paper to interested citizens throughout the city.

New Paper Grows.

One month after the first printed issue the size of the sheet was increased to 12 by 17 inches, and was printed on both sides of the paper, and was further enhanced in value by being distributed free throughout the city. The only collections at that time were for th advertisements that appeared in the sheet.

On the twentieth of that same month the patrons of the paper were notified that a subscription price of 25 cents a month would be at once placed on the delivered sheet. With this price on the paper the subscription list went right along growing. The Advertiser, at that time a rather slow-going weekly, said all kinds of small-sized things about the new Daily Bulletin venture, and predicted a short life.

As it is always best to let other people tell of your big doings it is here quoted what the Advertiser said of this paper on the eleventh of February, 1882:

"Messrs. J. W. Robertson & Co. have commenced the publication of their Daily Bulletin in printed form. The first number of this important addition to our list of local newspapers made its first appearance on the 1st. The proprietors confine themselves as they were wont to do in their written bulletin to the statement of facts without comment. The Daily Bulletin gives full shipping news to the hour of publication and brief accounts of local news."

On May 1, 1882, the Advertiser appeared as a daily. This was a spur to further efforts on the part of the pioneer daily and the Daily Bulletin came out on April 24th as a four-page paper with a special editor in the person of Henry Sheldon. From that day on the Bulletin took its proper place in the community affairs of the city, and became such a factor that in the month of January, 1883, the paper was sold, for the reason that it had grown to such proportions that Mr. Robertson could no longer devote the time to the paper from his other business. It passed to the proprietorship of Walter Hill. Later Chas. R. Buckland took the editorship, and from him it passed to Daniel Logan. It was about this time that the paper was incorporated, and it was then given a home of its own on Merchant street at the place adjoining the present Associates Garage.

Troubles Conquered.

During the political trouble in 1893 the Bulletin gathered to itself a peck of trouble, and was down a number of times but never out, and although the mortgage then held against the paper was foreclosed, and the plant sold, the same energy that is incorporated in the Bulletin today was back of it then, in the person of B. L. Finney, and it was soon demonstrated that when the plant was sold the Bulletin did not go with it, and the subscribers got their paper "just as if nothing had happened," and to rub it in a little harder it was made a daily issue of eight pages instead of four. Not a single issue was dropped during the trouble.

After Finney had gotten the Bulletin well on its feet again he had an understanding with A. V. Gear and others who were running the "Independent," with the result that the Independent was absorbed by the Bulletin. Shortly the paper was brought under the sole control of Mr. Gear, who ran it in connection with his large real estate business.

New Era Begins.

In June, 1889, Wallace R. Farrington took the editor's chair of the Bulletin. Having bought an interest in the paper with Mr. Gear and the incorporation of the company took place, Mr. Farrington taking up a larger amount of the stock. In 1900 the Weekly Bulletin was added to the business, and it can be found in every village and hamlet in the Territory. Mr. Farrington has continuously held the editorship of the paper since his advent, and for the last few years has had the general management of the whole business as well. This includes not only the hundreds of details connected with the newspaper itself, but the management of the largest job printing office and book bindery in the Territory, which includes an up-to-date plate making and engraving plant.

Every piece of machinery used in the whole Bulletin plant, from the book bindery to the big Duplex perfecting press, is of the most modern make. The floor space covered by the Evening Bulletin plant is approximately 12,100 square feet, and is all utilized at the present time.

THE DAILY BULLETIN AS IT APPEARED FEBRUARY 1, 1882.

SPLENDIDLY EQUIPPED PLANT EASILY LEADS

The Honolulu Star-Bulletin begins its career with an equipment such as no newspaper and publishing plant in this Territory ever before approached. In fact, the combined business of the Star and the Bulletin, now merged as one, is so great that two printing plants are to be operated.

The editorial, principal job printing and principal general publishing departments will be at 1059 Alakea street, the Bulletin's headquarters, while a business office and a job printing and binding department will also be maintained at the present Star building on Merchant street.

The combination of the two papers has resulted in an organization both in the newspaper and general publishing departments that is both large and efficient. The reportorial and editorial staff, the office forces, the number of men employed in the mechanical and job-printing departments, are all largely increased to meet the demands of a big paper, a big circulation and a big printing business.

For news publishing and job printing, the equipment is of the most superior kind. Seven linotype machines constitute a battery that can handle the news and the job work rapidly and efficiently. The Star-Bulletin has the only double machine in the Territory, a "head-letter" machine that sets heads for the newspaper in large and clear type. The Star-Bulletin has also a Model 5 machine which is the best equipped for the Territory for quick type changes and variety of "faces" or styles, as the layman would call them. The most up-to-date and effective machines for news work, job-printing and book-work have been installed.

How Circulation Is Handled.

To handle its big circulation, much larger than any newspaper in Hawaii has before approximated, the Star-Bulletin has the only Webb perfecting press in the Territory. This press prints and folds an eight-page and runs off thousands in short order, and the scores of hustling newsboys get the papers to its patrons.

In the matter of type equipment, the Star-Bulletin easily leads the field. The Bulletin and the Star had each recently installed large quantities of type of the latest and most attractive designs, both for advertising uses and for newspaper head. The two papers did not duplicate in their selections, and the combined resources of the plants are entirely adequate for all demands.

Completely Equipped.

The main plant, on Alakea street, occupies three floors, including the basement, where the big press operates. The office and bindery on Merchant street are large, bright, airy. On the third floor of the Alakea street plant is located the engraving department, which has already established itself in public favor by the quality of its product, both for news illustrations and for job work. Two new ruling machines, power cutter, punching and perforating machines, etc., are among the recent addition to the printing and job plant on this floor. A large Cliche press, two "monies" and seven platen presses round out a complete, well equipped job and bookbinding plant.

The combined plants occupy approximately 25,000 square feet of floor space and are well lighted and arranged to give both space to operate to greatest advantage and economy of unnecessary steps.

The Star-Bulletin plant stands today as a model of its kind and one which is equipped to meet the needs of a growing, progressive city and a developing territory, from every part of which it is given patronage on a basis of business efficiency and tangible results.

STAR ALWAYS FORCE FOR PROGRESS

Signal Service Done Annexation and American Citizenship

The Hawaiian Star Newspaper Association, Ltd., was incorporated March 5, 1893, by J. S. McGrew, John Emmeluth, George W. Smith and Alfred S. Hartwell, "for the promotion of the general interests of the people of the Hawaiian Islands and with the avowed and distinct purpose of promoting annexation to the United States."

At a directors' meeting held on the evening of March 27, 1893, Mr. Walter G. Smith was made managing editor and the first edition of the new paper was issued March 28, 1893. The paper at once took a prominent place in the community and began to build up a strong sentiment among the residents of the islands for annexation.

Mr. Arthur Johnstone, the first reporter of the new paper, assumed the editorship on May 1, 1894, and continued to write the editorials until December 1 of the same year, when the directors came to an agreement with Messrs. Ed Towse and Frank L. Hoogs whereby the two mentioned gentlemen were to assume active managership of both the editorial and business departments of the paper respectively.

First Talk of Combine.

This arrangement was renewed yearly until December 31, 1895, when the Bulletin made overtures with the purpose in view of amalgamating the two properties. This proposition was considered by the directors but it was decided to continue with the agreement made in 1894 with Messrs. Towse and Hoogs and the Bulletin was notified accordingly. This is the first instance recorded where a proposal to combine was made.

For two years more the editorship was held by Mr. Ed Towse, who resigned from his position on January 2, 1897. Mr. A. T. Atkinson was chosen to fill the vacancy and from this date on the paper devoted every effort toward annexation, which was finally brought about in August of the following year.

Control Purchased.

At the same time, Mr. Hoogs purchased control of the property with Mr. Atkinson still in the editor's chair. This arrangement was continued until June 30, 1904, when Mr. Atkinson severed his connection with the paper to take up his duties as Superintendent of Public Instruction.

There was no one chosen to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. Atkinson, Mr. Hoogs acting as both editor and manager with Chas. Rhodes as city editor. Mr. Hoogs continued as editor and manager of the paper until his death in February, 1908, when the property was sold to Mr. Charles H. Atherton for himself and family.

Mr. George F. Henshall was made editor and manager and continued the position until March 5, 1910, when he resigned and Mr. Daniel Logan was made editor.

New Building Erected.

The services of Mr. Walter G. Smith were secured as editor in January, 1911 and arrangements were made for the erection and equipment of a new building especially for the company. Many improvements were made and steps taken to furnish the paper with the best facilities possible.

When the resignations of the editor and business manager were received, negotiations were begun at once to fill both places and were progressing rapidly.

At this juncture, during the first part of June, a mutual friend of the controlling owners of both the Bulletin and the Star approached both parties urging that some effort be made to amalgamate the papers.

Completing a passage of twenty-two days the American schooner Robert Lewers reached Port Townsend from Honolulu last Saturday.

NO SPINSTERS IN TURKEY

There are no spinsters in Turkey, for every Turkish woman counts it her sacred right to have a husband. Even the slave girls, after seven years of service, are given their freedom and presented with a husband.

The young Turk, however, who desires a wife has not the right to his own choice, for it is left to his mother to pick out his wife. He is betrothed and three-quarters married before he knows what his future wife looks like.

When the mother of a young Turk decides that it is time her son should be married, or when he desires to be, she, in company with several other relatives, will visit the different harems and the girls will file out in front of her for inspection. Coffee is then served in small cups and the visitors scan carefully the faces of the girls. If a maiden proves satisfactory to the visitors her mother is immediately informed and then the betrothal gifts are exchanged. The young man sends his fiancee a pair of earrings or a pair of slippers and she sends him a gift in return.

Then comes the nikah or the religious and official marriage by which the couple are considered to be legally married, although the bride and groom do not meet until the conclusion of the "dughun ziafefe," or week of wedding festivities, which may not be held for some months after the nikah.

On the day appointed for the nikah the bridegroom and his witness repair to the home of the bride and in the selamlik discuss with her male relatives the payment of the nakiah or dowry. This question settled and the contract drawn up, the priest places himself before the door of the harem where the bride and her female relatives are gathered.

The bridegroom then repeats three times his desire to marry the girl, and, the bride having answered in the affirmative three times, the couple are considered to be married.

Next come the real nuptial festivities, which may immediately follow the nikah or come months after.

First the trosseau of the bride is sent with great pomp to the home of her husband. The carriers bear on their backs coffers and chests, and furniture; others carry baskets filled with fine linens and behind them walk the great company of relatives and neighbors. Musicians with flutes and tambourines discoursing strident music accompany them.

Up to this time the investigators alone have seen the bride, the other relatives and bridegroom not yet having seen her; so now comes the feast of the unveiling of the bride to the relatives. The bridegroom's house is filled with guests, who dance and frolic, the father of the bride being host, and at the home of the bride's mother the women are gathered together. The bride then dines with her father and the male guests, excepting the bridegroom, for the last time, and then goes back to the house of her mother, where the women proceed to stain her nails with henna.

She now returns to the house of the masculine contingent and has her fingers and palms painted with the henna. Then comes the cochatena, which is the most brilliant of the pre-nuptial fetes. All the near relatives are gathered and the men present, armed with swords, make a sort of sham attack on the bride, who bravely resists them. This is to preserve the new family from the evil eye, and after the bride has proved her bravery the men throw coins at her.

The zefaf follows, and is always celebrated on Friday. The bride, dressed in cloth of gold, enters the conjugal roof without the groom, who will not arrive until sunset, after his evening devotion at the mosque. Then he comes escorted by guests and when ready to pass the threshold is invested with marital authority in an odd manner. A relative strikes him three times on the back, while guests hurl money at him to invoke prosperity and then leave that he may meet his bride.

A dinner is served from a small table in the nuptial chamber, the principal dish being two roasted birds, a male and a female, which are the symbols of conjugal affection and fidelity.

After the servants have placed the dishes on the table and withdrawn, the husbands walks over and lifts the veil from the face of the bride and sees for the first time the face of his wife.
