PROF. MITCHEL'S NEW BOOK.
POPULAR ASTRONOMY
BY
O. M. MITCHEL, LL. D.,
Director of the Cincinnati and Dudley Observatories.
1 vol 12mo., illustrated, price $1 25.
This book is acknowledged by competent critics to be one of the most successful attempts ever made by any writer to explain a complicated science to the easy comprehension of the popular mind.
The author sets out with his reader upon an untiresome
JOURNEY THROUGH THE SOLAR SYSTEM, FROM
THE SUN TO NEPTUNE.
Stopping at each of the Planetary Bodies by the Way.
The appearance of the Sun and the Planets, as seen through a POWERFUL TELESCOPE, is accurately and graphically pictured, while, by a succession of admirable descriptions of the most complicated astronomical instruments, the reader is carried, in imagination, to the Professor in his Observatory, where all the intricacies of Transit and Declination of Right Ascension and Parallax are rendered simple and beautiful to a mind ignorant of sine or cosine.
The book, being adapted to general family reading, contains but few mathematical diagrams. The author has been signally successful in solving to the reader's mind many abstruse mathematical problems, without the aid of figures.
A series of
BEAUTIFUL LITHOGRAPHIC PRINTS,
Giving pictorial representations of various striking phenomena connected with the Solar System, constitutes an additional attractive feature of the work.
The successive chapters, gradually evolving a
COMPLETE HISTORY OF THE DISCOVERY, THE ORDER, AND THE PHENOMENA OF THE PLANETARY SYSTEM,
Excite a lively interest to the end. The vigorous and graphic style, the numerous historical incidents and illustrations, the fresh and unhackneyed mode of approaching and discussing the various themes, strikingly recall to the reader the author's interesting public lectures on the same subject.

CONTENTS OF THE WORK.

The general plan and scope of the work may be judged from a running sketch of its contents.

THE SUN.

The author begins with the Sun, as the starting-point of the Planetary System; detailing in a graphic narrative, the different discoveries in respect to its motion and magnitude which have been made from the time of Hipparcus to the present. The mode of computing the sun's distance from the Earth is explained by a simple figure, which a child could readily comprehend. The Phenomena of Spots, the Transit of Mercury and Venus, the Zodiacal Light, and the Solar Spots, pass before the reader's mind with their mysteries briefly solved in a single instructive chapter.

MERCURY.

Mercury, which is so difficult to be distinguished from the stars, and which Copernicus is said never once to have seen in his whole life, is traced in its orbit by the unscientific reader, with the aid even of the few observations left by the ancients. Its velocity is readily computed as more rapid than that of any other planet, while the telescope discovers it as undergoing changes like the Moon.

VENUS.

Venus, whether as the Morning or the Evening Star, may be unerringly found in its place in the sky by any reader who follows the author's simple directions. Her inferior and superior conjunctions, in her changing character of Lucifer and the Vesperus, with the striking phenomena of her various brilliancy, are beautifully explained, and her phases illustrated with lithographic prints. The author gives Mr. Schroter's calculation, that the mountains of Venus reach an altitude five times greater than the highest mountains of the Earth. It discusses, also, the still unsettled question, Has Venus a satellite?

THE EARTH.

Our own planet, whose apparent immobility was so long the stumbling-block of early astronomers, and which first gave up the secret of her motions to Copernicus, is treated in a style which would have equally astounded and delighted Ptolemy. In due order the author gives the Earth's magnitude, rotation and revolution; the phenomena of climates, seasons, and tides; the Moon's phases, eclipses, and telescopic appearances. The accurate and beautiful transcript of the lunar surface, which accompanies the description, were taken from observations recently made at the Dudley Observatory. A striking account is added of an immense cavity, 17,000 feet in depth, as seen on the Moon's surface by the great telescopes.

MARS.

The reader's introduction to Mars embraces an explanation of the theory of Epicycles, and a narrative of the discoveries of Kepler and Tycho Brahe. This graphic chapter, particularly its enumeration of Kepler's various hypotheses and expedients for solving the laws of motion, and concluding with the author's own observations made in 1845 in reference to the snow zones, constitutes one of the most interesting portions of the volume.

THE ASTEROIDS.

The family of the Asteroids, first discovered by a German society of planet-hunters, and furnishing some of the most interesting phenomena known to modern astronomy, are discussed both historically and scientifically. In regard to their number, the author announces his opinion that there is "just ground for supposing that there are thousands of these little worlds revolving in space."

JUPITER.

The physical appearances of this planet are lithographed as seen from Teneriffe in 1856. As its day is less than ten hours long, it presents a new face every five. An interesting narrative is given of the manner in which Galileo discovered Jupiter's moons through his second telescope, in his garden. The same chapter includes, also, a popular solution of the problem of the velocity of light, first demonstrated in calculating the eclipses of these satellites.

SATURN.

With this planet, the author has associated a considerable part of the history of the progress of Astronomical science; describing its ever triple form, as seen by Galileo, till the illusion was resolved into a ring by Huygens; and still later, till the one ring was resolved into two by Cassini; and finally announcing, as a result of more recent investigation, the existence of a third ring, of dusky hue, discernible only through a powerful telescope. In addition to this is an account of the successive discoveries of its eight moons, with an explanation of their complex eclipses.

LAWS OF MOTION.

A considerable portion of the volume is devoted to an elucidation of the Laws of Motion and Gravitation, showing the successive phenomena out of which the Copernican theory arose, together with the necessary deductions from Galileo's experiments in dropping stones, the centripetal and the centrifugal forces, and the application of these laws to systems of three revolving bodies, such as the earth, the sun and the moon. The facility with which these intricate combinations are reduced to simplicity in a few figures cannot fail to impress the reader's mind.

INSTRUMENTAL ASTRONOMY.

In the chapter on Instrumental Astronomy the author begins a series of pleasing illustrative experiments in weighing the planets, describing accurately the necessary instruments, and the manner of their use.

URANUS.

The account of Sir William Herschell's discovery of this planet is accompanied with geometrical illustrations of the singular deflections of its orbit, which led to the discovery of the new planet, Neptune.

COMETS.

The chapter on Comets embraces an account of the mysterious separation of Biela's Comet of 1846 into two, and a striking engraving of the well-remembered Comet of 1858.

MUTUAL PLANETARY ATTRACTIONS.

The perturbations and irregularities of motion common to all the planetary system occasioned by the ponderable character of the bodies are illustrated with numerous diagrams, showing the influence of the sun as a gravitation center, explaining the fluctuations of various large and small planets, and announcing, as a necessary cause of the wayward orbit of Mercury, the presence of a new planet between Mercury and the Sun, and its recent actual discovery by Le Verrier.

THE NEBULAR HYPOTHESIS.

The volume closes with a clear statement of the Nebular Hypothesis, including the argument advanced in its support by M. Pontecoulant.

ASTRONOMICAL TABLES.

A copious appendix contains Tables of Elements of the Sun, the Planets and their Moons, the discovered Asteroids, and the periodic Comets.

A GREAT SUCCESS.

On the whole, the present work, undertaken by the author not for the use of persons already familiar with the general principles and facts of astronomy, but for

POPULAR READING

by the multitude, including the

FAMILY CIRCLE, BOTH OLD AND YOUNG,

has been so successfully accomplished, and so signally vindicates the possibility of simplifying and popularizing an abstruse science, that

SCARCELY ANY INTELLIGENT READER, WHO HAS GONE THROUGH A SINGLE CHAPTER, WILL BE SATISFIED UNTIL HE HAS FINISHED THE WHOLE BOOK.

The publishers, therefore, do not hesitate to express their conviction that the work is

SUPERIOR TO ANY POPULAR TREATISE ON ASTRONOMY WHICH HAS EVER BEEN OFFERED TO THE PUBLIC, EITHER IN THIS COUNTRY OR IN ENGLAND.

This book will be sent by mail, prepaid, for ONE DOLLAR AND TWENTY-FIVE CENTS.
