Salt—Yes, miss, we had an awful storm here last week. That lighthouse was washed away except for a few blocks of stone. Miss—Dear me! Whatever did they build it in such an exposed position for?

COAL ECONOMY IS NOW EAGERLY SOUGHT

Before the members of the Institute of Marine Engineers, London, Mr. Arthur E. Jones read a paper on "Fuel Gas Analysis and its Advantages." He said it was gradually comming to be realize that no steam raising plant which lays claim to any importance was really completely furnished unless automatic CO_2 recorders were installed. These recorders would help to bring about a healthy rivalry between the various shifts, and it might be of advantage to devise a system of bonuses to encourage the stokers to show good results. Further, the question appealed to them personally when they once realized that the more efficient coal burned, the less they have to throw on.

The amount of coal burned throughout the course of a year on any vessel was comparatively very large, so that quite a small percentage of saving through increased efficiency would total up to a considerable item annually But there was another point. Take the case of a fast liner on which the rate for cargo was high. If the proper use of CO_2 recorders permanently raised the efficiency of the boiler furnaces, a less quantity of coal would suffice for each voyage, so that only would there be the resulting economy in coal, but valuable space formerly reserved for fuel could be utilized for cargo.

It was obvious that, apart from economy, the avoidance of any considerable amount of smoke from the funnels would be desirable, especially on passenger boats. Again, the recorder had a very direct bearing on the serious question of leaky tubes in marine boilers. The more irregular the firing, the more extreme and rapid would be variations in temperture, resulting in undesirable stresses through expansion and contraction. Irregular in firingwould be accompanied by irregularity in the CO_2 record, which would plianly show what was happening, and call attention to the need for alteration in the methods of the stokers.
