MECHANICAL INGENUITY.

An Ingenious Device for Cooking Eggs Hard or Soft.

An ingenious little European device for cooking eggs is made in the shape of a box which contains a tin drum hermetically sealed and filled with a fluid that does not change, says the Jewelers' Weekly. The drum, hung upon its axis, describes a semicircle to the right. The balls that belong to the mechanism are placed in corresponding openings and from these are passed into a cup-shaped cavity on the outer surface of the drum. The fluid contained in the latter prevents the drum from turning too rapidly, and it flows very slowly from one to the other of the various peculiarly-connected chambers.

By throwing the ball into the deeper or shallower of the cups the time for the rotation is regulated. When these cavities reach the ball drops out on a bell underneath. After the signal has been given the ball rolls back to its original cup and the mechanism adjusts itself anew. When the machine is to be used again the lever shown on the side of the box is turned for a moment to the left.

Both hard and soft boiled eggs can be cooked by this ingenious regulator. It is very easily manipulated. As soon as the eggs have been put into the boiling water one of the little balls which come with every machine is thrown into one of the openings on top. The openings are marked "soft" or "hard." The eggs will have boiled the proper length of time when the ball gives the signal.
