A Romance in Skeleton.

A Calm, delightful Autumn Night—
A Moon's mysterious golden Light—
A Maiden at her Window Bright,
In Robes of pure and frosty White.

The little Wicket Gate ajar—
A Lover creeping from afar,
With tuneful voice and light Guitar,
To woo his radiant Evening Star!

A Lute with soft, bewildering Twang—
Oh, how the doting Lover sang!
A Bull Dog, with Remorseless Fang—
A Nip, a rip, a Double Pang.

A Maiden with a startled Glance—
A Shrieking for Deliverance—
A kind of sound, resembling dance—
A Pair of Rivet Double Pants.

A Maiden fainting with Affright—
A Lover in a sickening Plight—
A Bull Dog chuckling with delight—
A wild, delicious Autumn Night!

A DIVER FOR THE DEAD.

Talk with an old Man who made his Living by Searching for Articles lost in the Rivers and for Drowned Persons.

The first chapter in Dicken's novel "Our Mutual Friend," presents to the reader the sombre picture of Gaffer Hexam, the searcher for drowned persons in the black waters of the Thames, in the pursuit of his ghastly business. That man who has followed a similar business, that of grapplin, diver and searcher after dead bodies for the last fifty odd years, lives within a short distance from the Fulton ferry, Brooklyn, is probably known to few. At No. 36 Cranberry street, in a small old-fashioned cottage painted white, with green shutters and a small portico in front, with green-painted lattice work, over which an ivy trails its irregular course, lives John H. Brower, who has been engaged in the business referred to for almost a lifetime. A Tribune reporter found the old man in the small court-yard adjoining his humble home one day last week. All the objects in the yard were strongly suggestive of nautical pursuits. An old weather-beaten, four-oared yawl occupied the greater part of the little enclosure, while one corner was taken up by a couple of oars, another by a small rusty anchor, some chains and scraps. The only living occupant of the yard at the time of the reporter's visit was a decrepit looking, white-haired old man, engaged in tinkering at the old boat. He said he was John H. Bower, the person the reporter was in search of.

Being requested to give some reminiscences of his career in his peculiar trade, the old man seated himself upon the gunwale of the boat, and gazing with a far-off look in his mild blue eyes at the worn sides of what had been for many years a tried and trusted companion, said:

"I've been in the business of grapplin' and divin' for over fifty years, for I began when I was about twenty, and I'm nigh onto seventy-four now. I was born and brought up in this State and so were my father and grand-father before me. I'm an American to the back-bone. I've done grapplin' and wreckin' in the East and North rivers, in the Long Island Sound, at Sandy Hook and Bell Gate, and have always succeeded in makin' a pretty good livin' out of it, I can tell you. I've raised thousands o' tons o' railroad iron, anchors, big and little, chains, cabbes, besides canal-boats, bodies, and rings, watches, lockets and other jewelry. One of the best jobs I've ever had, was durin' the war, when the Government was buildin' an iron-clad at the Navy Yard. Eighty-four steel plates, each fourteen feet long, four feet wide and three inches thick, were lyin' near the dock. The weight was too much for the old pier, and she broke down, sendin' the plates to the bottom of the East river. They sent for me, and asked me to get the plates for'em. I said I would, but I wanted $10 for each plate I got out. They were satisfied and I went to work. 'Well, Brower,' said the Captin', 'I s'pose it'll take you a couple o' days to get one o' them plates up.' 'Days,' said I, 'jest you come back in an hour or an hour an' a half, an' I'll show you somethin'!' He laughs kinder, and walks off, thinkin' I'm a blowin.' Well, I jest got my grapplin' hooks 'round them plates, and when the Captin' came back I had three on the pier. I jest tell you he opened his eyes.

"A canal boat full of coal lying in her dock got a hole stove in her by a steamboat runnin' into her and was sunk. I got the job of liftin' her and gettin' out her cargo if possible. It was mighty hard work, but get her up I did, and by bucketsfull, every pound of coal in her. I've done some treasure liftin', too. A Spanish brig dropped a cag of dollars that she was takin' out to South America overboard in the harbor here, a good many ago. There was a very strong tide runnin' at the time, and the divers that were sent after the cag soon gave it up as a bad job. Somebody told the Spanish Captin' about my luck in findin' things, and he sent for me. He offered me $200 to get up that cag. I went down, and knowin' the harbor so intimately, I soon found it. But here was a fix; the bottom of the cag had fallen out and the dollars were strewed around it. Well, I jest went aboard ship again, got my scoop net an' went down again. Then I put the dollars all back in the cag fastened my scoop-net over it and had it drawed up. So I made my $200."

"Have you brought up many bodies of drowned persons?"

"Well, I should jest say I had; over fifty, I guess. A great many women, too. They seem to be kind o' fond o' drownin' themselves. One of the queerest cases I can remember was that of a watchman at a North river dock. He had gone at night to his dock, and the next mornin' his hat was found lying' in the dock, but he was gone. Well, they scraped the river for his body, high and low, but couldn't find him. They sent for me when they was at their wit's ends, and I went to hunt him up. I was a good deal puzzled at first that he shouldn't be at the bottom of the river, but at last I thought of lookin' at the piles. There sure enough I found him, with arms and legs so tightly clasped around the pile that I had a good deal of trouble in getting' him off. He had evidently fallen in the water and tried to skin up the pile, but his strength gave out before he was half-way up, and he was drowned. Another case, I remember, was that of a son of a rich man, who was drowned while bathin' off South Ferry. Well, the father tried everything to get the body, engaged divers, had cannon-balls fired into the river, so that they would stir up the bottom and the water 'd force the body up. But it was no use, the body couldn't be found; the divers gave it up, sayin' it had probably been swept out to sea by the strong tide running at the time. At last they sent for me, and offered me a big reward to find the boy. Now the secret of my success in findin' bodies was that I always found out how the tide had stood when one had got lost, and went down at the exact turn, grouped along the bottom and always found it. I done the same in this case, but the tide 'd been so strong the day the boy was lost that he had drifted a good ways along the bottom. At last I found him. But how? I tell you it was awful. Wedged under an anchor chain, decomposed and half eaten up by fishes. I found the lad. I had to go up three times before I got him by pieces. It was a terrible job. Yes, I've made a great deal of money by findin' bodies there was a reward on.

"I've often been called as an expert in cases where divers had disputes about their pay for bringin' up things. I remember a case some years ago, when a diver named Monroe had got up a lot of iron from the river that had been lost from off a boat comin' over the North river for a company in New York. They only wanted to give him the regulation price of 60 cents a bar, but as he'd a great deal o' trouble in fetchin' it up he wanted more. Well, the matter went into court, and I was called as an expert. 'Brower,' said the judge to me, 'how much would you a' charged for that air job?' 'Well, judge, yer Honor,' said I, 'that depends. If the iron was lost in still, clear water I'd charge 60 cents a bar; but in such water as the North river I wouldn't do it under $1 50.' The judge also thought that there were a difference between still and rough water, and so Monroe got his money.

"Yes, as I say, I've made a good deal of money in findin' things that other divers have given up. When they do that they take off their buoys, and according to law, when another man does find what's lost, then he gets one-third the value of it. Do I intend to go at it again? Oh, yes; when the warmer weather comes I'll go down. I'm not too old fort it yet.'

The Coming Light.

Letters patent have just been taken out by a patent solicitor in Cleveland, Ohio, for a new device for producing cheap light and fuel. The claim made for it is the bold one of utilizing the oxygen in the atmosphere as a heating and lighting medium, by a method so simple and inexpensive that nothing short of experimental demonstration has induced men to entertain its possibility. The device consists of an ordinary air-tight cylinder, into which is introduced a paste compound of certain proportions of gasoline and powdered charcoal, on top of which is packed tightly some fibrous material, like cotton. Through a pipe in one end of this cylinder is forced atmospheric air, subjected to a greater or less degree of compression according as heat or light is desired, and the resulting product is led from the other end into a receiver, and thence into a main just as coal gas now is, and is burned in a similar manner. The degree of heat from this gas varies with the compression—the greater the compression the more intense the heat, and under a sufficient and easily attained compression a heat is produced so intense as to astonish all who have witnessed it, and to promise wonderful results for the invention. The inventor is Mr. Edward B. Reynolds, a young Englishman recently arrived in that country. He has explained his device and demonstrated its utility to practical moneyed men here, and has enlisted their hearty co-operation in pushing it. One of these is Mr. W. H. Dean, a wealthy oil refiner, and this gentleman will be prominent in the stock company now being formed. He offered Mr. Reynolds $200,000 for a one-third interest in the invention, but it was declined. Private tests were made in New York city, where a chemical analysis showed that 80 per cent. of the product was oxyhydrogen gas. The inventor claims, however, that he can and does produce 90 per cent.

A large tinsmith establishment here has fully tested the gas as a heater, and is now putting in pipes with a view to abandoning coal and coal gas altogether. The foreman, in experimenting with the gas, discovered that he could melt a quarter-inch bar of iron in thirty seconds. A cylinder charged with a pint of gasoline supplied four brilliant lights nightly for four weeks. One probable method of utilizing the gas as an illuminator is by producing the calcium light.

The invention is exciting much attention among those interested in electric light and gas stocks, and in fact from everybody. They are anxiously inquiring whether the coming light has come.
