A MYSTERY UNRAVELLED.

The Strange History of Rear Admiral Sir William S. Wiseman—His Death at St. Joseph, Mo.—Fate of a Strange Woman.

From the St. Joseph (Mo.) Herald, Aug. 23.

Our readers will remember that several weeks ago a gentleman who had registered himself as "William Chambers" died very suddenly at the Saunders House. Papers found upon his person satisfied the Coroner that this was not the man's real name, and his personal appearance indicated that he had occupied no ordinary station in society. These papers were kept concealed from the public gaze by the Coroner, who at once notified the parties he supposed to be interested in the facts of the case. A week or so ago, after the death, Dr. Trevor received a note from a Mr. Downing, who resides near Fairfield, Nebraska, stating that the deceased was Sir William S. Wiseman, Rear Admiral in the British navy, and that he was his agent, and asking that the papers and effects in the hands of the Coroner should be sent to him. This request Dr. Trevor refused to comply with, as he had no evidence of Mr. Downing's authority.

On Thursday last Dr. Trevor received a letter from a son of the deceased, Wm. Wiseman, Esq., Garrick Club, Garrick street, London, dated Aug. 4. Yesterday he received another letter, in which the writer states that Mr. Downing had no authority to act in the premises, and asking that all papers and documents belonging to his father be sent to him. In this letter he renews his thanks to Dr. Trevor, and also to Dr. Hancie, rector of Christ Church, and others, for the attention shown to his father's remains. In compliance with this request Dr. Trevor sent all the documents by express to the son of the late Sir Wm. S. Wiseman.

And now come a few more developments in the case. Sir Wm. S. Wiseman left England hurriedly several years ago, came to the United States, and at once sought a home in the West. He first settled in Gage county, Nebraska, and purchased a considerable quantity of land on time from the B. and M. Railroad Company. He made the first payment, but failed to make the others, and the company claim that his title to the land is forfeited, although lawyers do not agree upon this question. Two years ago he took out naturalization papers, thus becoming a citizen of the United States, with the evident intention of making his home in this country.

For some time after he came to Nebraska the deceased led a very quiet life, carefully avoiding society, and seemingly intent only on improving the place he had purchased. In the course of a few years, however, he commenced visiting Lincoln, and while there he was accompanied by a brilliant, beautiful, dashy woman, who passed under the name of Annie Chambers. This woman the Baronet seemed devoted life and soul. He was with her constantly in society, and all his leisure hours were passed in her company. What the relations subsisting between them were the public never knew; but their intimacy was so marked that it excited considerable comment among the good citizens of Lincoln. Upon this woman Sir William Wiseman showered gold, diamonds, silverware, and wealth of all kinds. His generosity seemed unbounded and his resources inexhaustible.

Then there came a change, and he seemed to tire of the society with which he had once been enchanted. He visited Lincoln less frequently, and then went but little into society. And then in a short time came the announcement of the marriage of Annie Chambers to Mr. Downing. The latter had assisted the baronet in the management of his Nebraska affairs. These parties settled down near Fairfield, and apparently lived happily together. Some months ago Mrs. Downing died, and her husband, of course, fell heir to her property, including the rich presents that had been made by Sir William Wiseman. A few days ago the diamonds, silver plate, &c., were sold by Mr. Downing. Mr. Peyton, agent of the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company at Fairfield, becoming the principal purchaser.

At Lincoln, last winter, a young fellow appeared who claimed to be the nephew of "Wm. Chambers." In reference to this, the son of Sir William Wiseman writes that his father had no sister, and no brother that had ever been married; and does not understand how he could have a nephew.

Four months ago Sir William Wiseman left for England, and passed some time there. His visit must have been a clandestine one, as the letters of his son, found upon his person, warned him to, under no circumstances, let his whereabouts be known. He was on his return from England when his sudden death occurred.

A special reporter of the Herald, who has been ferreting out the facts of this case, gives us the following particulars, which will explain the mystery:

Some time since a daring robbery was committed in London by one of the leaders of the demi monde, in this manner: The tradesmen had full confidence in her ability to pay all the debts she contracted, and on the strength of this she sent orders for specimens of costly jewelry, silks, satins, and in fact everything appertaining to a lady's wardrobe, from which she stated she wished to select. Instead of returning these specimens, she packed them up and left the country, it is supposed, in company with Sir Wm. Wiseman and his valet, Downing. They arrived at Lincoln, Neb., in due time, where they disposed of some of the jewelry and other valuables, purchasing land under ground, with the proceeds. Assuming aliases, they settled down near Fairfield, Neb., all living together.

Some time after their arrival Downing and Annie Chambers were married, in consequence, it is supposed, of an altercation between Wiseman and Downing respecting her. A short time after the wedding she fell sick, no physician or assistance of any kind being called, and died. After her death Downing claimed her personal effects, and proceeded to sell the jewels, &c., at every available opportunity. In the meantime Wiseman and a man named Peacey had some trouble respecting $800 which Peacey claimed was due him. A diamond ring was pawned for a passage to England, and Wiseman, accompanied by Peacey, started for that country, leaving Downing in possession of everything of the purpose of obtaining some money which Sir William claimed was due him from property there. His return, death, and the conduct of Downing has been fully recorded. The above facts were gathered from parties living in the neighborhood of Wiseman's residence in Nebraska, and are as near as we could learn reliable.

An Attempt to Poison Glester.

From the Baltimore Times, Aug. 23.

At noon on the day of the race of the 2:30 class, Mr. Alden Goldsmith, the owner of Glester, entered the stall, and noticing that Glester was not tasting his dinner, asked the groom what the matter was. The latter remarked that he ate his breakfast well enough, and appeared all right. Mr. Goldsmith took up a handful of oats and also saved nothing in the smell, but on putting them to his lips found they had been laced with something strong enough to take the skin off. He called in Budd Doble, and he tried them with the same result. They were sent to the city and a sample of them were brought to the city and analyzed by a chemist, who pronounced them poisoned with some homeopathic preparation of sufficient strength to have killed the horse if he had eaten the oats. The vile plot must have been concocted by some wretch who had bet heavily against Glester. The most promising horse on the American turf had a narrow escape.
