DELAWARE RIVER FISHING.

SHAD AND BLACK BASS RETURNING TO THEIR OLD HAUNTS.

Successful Work of the Fish Commission in Restocking Fished-out Waters—Spearing Shad at Lackawaxen Dam—Salmon Seen.

LACKAWAXEN, Pa., May 22.—The great success that has attended the efforts of the United States Fish Commissioners in restocking the Delaware River with shad is well demonstrated by the appearance of that delicate fish in large schools as far up the river as this place this season. Years ago shad were plenty in the Delaware, even in its very upper waters. The people living along the valley, from Hancock down, annually captured thousands of them in bush seines and eel weirs. The rocky and uneven bottom of the river prevented successful net fishing above Milford, and the methods mentioned above were so destructive to the shad that they gradually disappeared from the stream, so that for the past twenty years very few have been seen above Milford. Thirty years or so ago the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company constructed a dam across the Delaware at this place to turn water from the river into the canal. This prevented what shad were still pushing their way up stream from passing any further, and since then none have spawned above the dam. As shad were growing scarcer every year, however, and the belief was general that in a few years they would be extinct in the Delaware, no effort was made to secure such change in the dam as would permit them to run on up the river, and shad fishing in the upper Delaware became a thing of the past. In 1872 the stock of shad had become so small in the river that the fisheries at Milford yielded only single fish where a few years before the catch was hundreds. In that year the Fish Commission turned its attention to restocking the river. Three years afterward the catch at all the net fisheries began to increase, and in 1876 several shad were seen at the foot of the dam at Lackawaxen. In 1877 a number of very large ones were taken at the dam by means of spears. This year hundreds have been speared. They gather in schools at the foot of the dam, vainly seeking passage over it. Men and boys collect on the bulkheads and breakwaters in the stream below the dam, and with large eel spears find no difficulty in taking out as many as they like. Shad weighing seven pounds have been killed at the dam this spring, and the sale of the fish has netted a nice profit to local fishermen.

Now the up-river people are discussing means of opening the river above the dam to the fish, and intend to demand the construction of a fishway in the dam. The canal company, even if it was not required by law to leave a waterway in the dam, is willing to comply with this request from the people. But if the upper waters are again stocked with shad the old methods of capturing them cannot be resorted to, because the law now forbids bush-seine and weir fishing. Unless such improvements can be made in the river that nets may successfully be dragged, the prospective return of the shad to the waters above Lackawaxen will not be of any great benefit to the residents in the way of fishing. It will, however, open such spawning places as few shad streams in the country possess.

The Lackawaxen dam, it was believed, would be an insurmountable barrier to the black bass with which the river was stocked when the shad were put in. The bass appeared at Lackawaxen, below the dam, and afforded excellent sport four years ago. No one thought of trying for them above the dam until two years ago. Then a boy, fishing for chubs in Holbert's Bend, a mile up the river, captured a three-pounder with a grasshopper bait. Bass fishing began at once. Now bass are above the dam, and now those waters, especially at Narrowsburg, in Big Eddy, are favorite fishing grounds. The bass appear to have found the dam no obstacle, although it does not seem possible that any fish, except it might be a trout or salmon, could leap it.

At the time of the coming of the first settlers in the Delaware Valley the stream and its tributaries were not only teeming with shad, but with salmon and trout as well. Only the spear of the Indian had intruded into their haunts at that day. The eel weir, the fyke, quicklime, and other destructive agents came in with civilization, and the gradual extinction of those game fish followed. Trout—always of great size—are occasionally taken from the Delaware, but up to 1877 a salmon had not been seen in the river for sixty years. About the time the streams were stocked with shad, and the bass were put in, salmon fry were also turned into the Delaware. Nothing was heard from these until 1877, when a six-pound salmon was caught in an eel weir, near Carpenter's Point, below Port Jervis, and a nine-pounder was shot in the Bushkill Creek, at Easton. Since then numbers of large salmon have been seen in the river, but none have been captured. It is the opinion of fishermen that in time salmon will again be common in the upper Delaware, as bass are now and as shad are coming to be.

Black bass fishing in the Delaware opens on June 1. The favorite fishing places are at Milford, Port Jervis, Pond Eddy, Shohola, Lackawaxen, and Narrowsburg, the furthest point being but little over one hundred miles from New York, on the Erie Railway.

Buying his Neighbor's Wife.

From the Indianapolis Journal.

In Jackson township, Decatur County, a bachelor bought a neighbor's wife of her impecunious husband for $1[illegible], with the understanding that the latter was to retain charge of the two children. He then sold his farm and went West, taking his purchase along.
