hon shall be minister. Richelieu enters the house by a secret key, and really thinking he has won the wager, sends a note to d'Aubigny to that effect. The last named youth gets in a terrible passion—challenges the Duke to fight a duel; both are arrested by the Lieutenant of the Marshal's Court, and obliged to give their honor not to meet until the point of honor shall have been brought before the old fogies. D'Aubigny will not do this, but proposes to throw dice with the Duke—the lowest in three throws to blow his brains out, with six hours' grace. The Duke assents, and wins. D'Aubigny intends to keep his word; but in the six hours great changes takes place. The Duke finds that De Prie wrote the letters—the Prime Minister is arrested—the Marquise is sent to rusticate in disgrace—Gabrielle is absolved from her oath—Richelieu makes a splendid apology and entire retraction, and the curtain comes down on a tableau of unadulterated affection and perfect happiness.

"M'lle De Belle Isle" is a stirring and effective drama, full of intrigue and incident. It is, in point of construction, the best modern play in which M'lle Rachel has yet appeared here. The dialogue is crisp, sharp and smart, like Dumas' novels, and the piece is doubtless a fair picture of the immorality of the French court under the reign of a king who had all the vices, with none of the virtues of his predecessors. Whether it is right to put the grossness of the Richelieus and De Prios of that day before us, is not properly a question for us at this time. It may be immoral, but virtue gets rewarded at the end, and it's very nice. It has already been adapted to the English stage by Mrs. Butler, (Fanny Kemble,) under the title of "The Duke's Wager."

As will be seen by the above sketch of the plot, the part that M'lle Rachel acts is that of a pure young girl, all naiveté, innocence and book muslin, who finds herself in an atmosphere of intrigue and debauchery unsurpassed in any age of the world. She moves gracefully through the first and second acts, all unconscious of the web which is surrounding her. She is filled with love, paternal, filial, and the first whisper of a more absorbing passion for her handsome chevalier. M'lle Rachel looked positively beautiful in this part, and any duke would have fallen in love with her. In the third act, where she discovers that there has been a plot against her, and that her lover believes her guilty, all the fury of an injured vestal darted from her eyes. Her scene with Richelieu was very fine, and she fully deserved the call before the curtain at its conclusion. She seemed to have made the most minute analysis of Gabrielle's character, and lost no point in giving the results of her study to the audience. It was a triumph of that quiet, subdued style of acting of which M'lle Rachel is at once the exponent and the leader. The house was crowded.

After a career of success far exceeding the most sanguine expectations even of her most enthusiastic admirers, this wonderful artiste is about to bid us adieu for a time. If any proof were needed that her success has been legitimate, it might be found in the fact that, despite some errors of management unavoidable to a foreign director, her popularity and power over her auditors have increased with every additional performance. The success of this, her last engagement, was greatly endangered by her appearance at the Academy of Music, the vast extent of which renders it wholly unfit for the performances of Mlle. Rachel, which, to be fully enjoyed, demand that the facilities for seeing and hearing should be perfect; that every glance of her eye, every tone of her voice, every action, however slight, should be distinctly visible or audible. At the Academy all the finest points of her acting were lost. Mlle. Rachel evidently felt this; she made almost superhuman efforts, but in vain: the electric sympathy between the artiste and the audience was broken, lost in space. With the decision and promptitude of good management, M. Raphael Felix at once engaged Niblo's Garden, and there, in a theatre of perfect proportions, and reasonable size, with the finest acoustic qualities, and so arranged that every seat commands a perfect view of the whole stage, Mlle. Rachel achieved the crowning triumph of her career. The thousands who have crowded this beautiful house during her appearance here, have heard and seen her in perfection, and it has been evident to all that Mlle. Rachel has been able to produce there her most extraordinary and admirable effects, without those exhausting efforts which were demanded in less appropriate theatres. The desire to be present at her farewell performance this evening has reached fever heat. The demonstration to-night will, undoubtedly, be enthusiastic and brilliant, and will suffice to convince Mlle. Rachel that her return to New York will be anxiously looked for and brilliantly inaugurated.

The Election has been rather profitable to trade, if we may judge by the number of orders on bets which our friend Knox has had to fulfill. Americans, reformers, hard shells and soft shells, all appear to have agreed upon the superiority of Knox's hats, and in making their bets upon the results, have stipulated that Knox was to furnish the hats. We should add that KNOX's only Hat Emporium, is at No. 212 Broadway

Genin's Excelsior.—As was anticipated, this beautiful novelty in soft hats has met with the most complete success; the numerous workmen employed upon it being barely able to keep pace with the demand. In shape it is admitted to be unequalled, and its color, a rich, dark claret-brown, is peculiarly adapted to the season, and has never before been produced in any hat manufactory, either abroad or in this country. GENIN, 214 Broadway, opposite St. Paul's church.

Old Hat.—The Above is a Platform which the New Hat Company repudiates in toto; all who are opposed to it will please call at their stores, 146 and 148 Nassau street, and buy a new one. Price only three dollars.

Mealio's Fall Style of Hats are Superior to any in the city—light, durable and of a superior finish. Corner of Broadway and Canal street.

"Moreos pro Merito."—The Only Leather medal awarded by the discriminating judges on daguerreotypes, at the late fair, was in honor of HUMES', the poor unfortunate picture maker, 289 Broadway.

The Superb Ambrotypes of R. A. Lewis, No. 142 Chatham street, were awarded a premium at the Fair of the American Institute. These beautiful gems of art are taken equally as well in cloudy as clear weather.

Pianofortes and Melodeons—Manufactured by JOHN P. WAKE & CO., No. 167 Canal street, near Varick, fully warranted for tone and workmanship equal to any in the city, and 20 per cent less than Broadway prices. N. B.—Second hand pianos at great bargains.

CAUTION TO THE PUBLIC.

In the year 1848 I fortunately succeeded in making a discovery in the manufacture of gin, by which it was deprived of all acrid and inflaming properties, and rendered perfectly pure.

This article was introduced to the public under the title of "Wolfe's Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps."

My manufactory for this article is at Schiedam, in Holland, and no individual, save myself, has imported, or can import a solitary bottle of this pure alcoholic preparation.

The reputation which it rapidly acquired, as one of the most powerful curatives in disease, and as a wholesome, invigorating and pleasing beverage, is without a parallel in the history of importations. Many thousand of our most enlightened physicians, after full trial, have borne testimony to its medical properties in the cure of many disressing maladies. Analytical chemists, over their own signatures, have certified to its purity, and our citizens, in every section of the Union, have attested that, as a beverage, it is free from all those impurities and adulterations which, in the spirituous compounds of the day, form a basis for intemperance, and which are sold under the names of brandy, rum, gin, and their relatives.

The well earned celebrity of the "schnapps" soon excited the avarice of speculation, and my genuine article had scarcely received the impress of universal public approbation when a host of imposters, imitators, and importers of a spurious article from other parts of Europe than Holland entered the lists for competition, determined, if possible, to thrust their base imitations into the market under the title of pure gin. There are certain national peculiarities in manufacture which distinguish that of one country from another by superior excellence, totally beyond the reach of any imitation. England has long been famed for her porter, which art in other countries has never equalled. Scotland and Ireland for their whiskey; France for her unequalled brands of brandy, and Holland for her gin.

The imitations of gin in other parts of Europe, have been as far inferior to that of Holland, and especially of Schiedam, in that kingdom, as the common root beer in our city is inferior to the double brown stout of Great Britain.

The moral consequences arising from the administration of a pure article are not the least among its benefits; in Holland and Germany, where pure Hollands gin is a common beverage, drunkenness is rarely if ever, seen; the same remarks apply to the wines of France. Notwithstanding the French mechanics and peasants drink Bordeaux wine as we do water at their "table d'hotes," intoxication can scarcely be found among them.

In England, where, as in our own country, the basest adulterations are made in spirituous liquors, particularly in those sold in the "gin palaces," under various names, intemperance in all its loathsomeness and deformity, has scarcely a parallel.

It is not the genuine article, but the base, spurious adulteration, which inflames the stomach, excites the brain, deprives its victim of his reason, destroys his constitution and hurries him to the tomb.

These adulterated compositions manufactured in and imported from Europe, have, unfortunately, since the introduction of my Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps, found their way here in overwhelming abundance; their importers and retailers have palmed them upon the public as equal in medicinal properties to my article. Medical testimony, having no legitimate claim to that title, has been trumped up to ensnap the unwary and credulous; and the degrading imposition has, sometimes, unfortunately succeeded, to the injury and destruction of health, and the increase rather than the alleviation of the disease.

The effects of the "Schnapps" are the tests of its purity. Judiciously taken as a general beverage, it will not intoxicate, its stimulation is gentle, and unattended with those burnings and cravings of the stomach, which in the exhibition of impure spirits, constantly demand a fresh supply, and which no repetation within the limits of intoxication can satiate.

I have no disposition to urge anything in opposition to the "Maine law," the substituting the use of the "Aromatic Schiedam Schnapps," for the inflammatory compounds under the name of alcohol, sold in the low groggeries of our city, would do much to insure the moral effects which that law is intended to produce; intoxication would be greatly diminished.

Notwithstanding I have surrounded my preparation with every safeguard which prudence could suggest, I still receive daily communications informing me of base imitations under its name, of my bottles being filled with the most impure gin, corked up, sealed and sold as the "Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps." I have endeavored, still further, to guard the public from these impositions and maintain the reputation of my importation; should they still be evaded, I trust the sufferers, wherever they may be, will give me the most early information, when, in their behalf equally with my own, I shall appeal to the laws of the country to protect them and myself.

Astounding Testimony.—Jersey City, Nov. 16, 1855.—Dr. L. B. Wright.—Dear Sir—Knowing that you have recently placed your valuable medicines before the public, it occurred to me that I might be able to render you a favor by stating what it has done for my wife. My wife who is boring under a severe pulmonary affection, (disease of the lungs,) and had been treated by several eminent physicians, who declared her case incurable, and stated at their opinion that she could not long survive, I then sent for you. You gave her your scrofulous antidote, and I am happy to say that it has made a perfect cure, and sufficient time has elapsed to prove her cure permanent. You are at liberty to make whatever disposition you please with this, and refer any one to us for the truth of the same, at 73 Mercer street, Jersey City.
