A Year Ago!

A year ago!
Mournfully,
Tenderly,
Words, as to some solemn music flow!
How long ago night sudder seem;
Life for ever moving on,
Present soon is all as surely gone
As far past we almost think a dream;
And we grasped but yesterday
Joy as a shadow, far away;
Voice that thrill'd but now upon our ear
Hushed, and we at best can keep
Echoes, that must soon so deeply sleep,
All the past is long ago, the near
Lay as the distant, and we start
To think how to our soon-forgetting heart
"Year" sounds scarce longer than "a year ago."

A year ago
I had beside me in his truth,
The glory of his youth,
And whose like can never comfort me:
Now between us rolls the unloving sea;
But though hearts be joiner, hand, voice and eye,
Love each to each make sweet reply,
That happy time, a year ago.

A year ago!
Why must all things thus forever change!
Unloved, new and strange
Grows the old we love and know;
Griefs or griefs! grows dearer and more dearer,
Counts worthiest that which is most near,
Time fast speeding on, and faster yet
Life and oblivion, we forget,
Go dimly, part by part,
Even stirred all the fountains of the heart,
Close that is for ever flown,
Among long ages and ages gone,
Only a year ago.

Her Threat.—A Story for New Year.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"What had we better do for the children on New Year's day? Of course they'll be expecting something in the way of enjoyment, and I don't know what the world it shall be? And the fair young mother fell down for a moment the child's dress she was hemming, and looked up questioningly in the face of a gentleman who sat on the opposite side of the table, deeply immersed in politics and prices. He put down his paper a moment. "Well, really, I don't know what to say Jane. It's easy enough to think of something that will please them, I suppose. What did you do last year?"

"We gave them a party. But that's so much work, and then some of the children are sure to be sick with eating cakes and confectionary—no, I think a party is out of the question."

"Well, then, what do you think of a ride, most of the children never saw the clouds were gathering so fast when I came home from the office."

"That is just the thing, Ralph, dear Howard and I can enjoy it so much." And Mrs. Young clasped her hands with a girlish sort of grace and spirit which even motherhood had not entirely taken from her manners.

"We can go down to the shore and see the skating, I'll be as happy (precious little dears!) as a dog with apple buds all the morning. Oh, I do hope it will snow!"

"I think my dear, your hopes will be realized in the morning." And the gentleman resumed his paper, and the lady her sewing, while the wind howled and strengthened without, as though it was throwing out a wild defiance to the year that was coming!

"Such a ride, mamma! Oh, goody! goody!" The clapping of hands, and dancing of feet, and ringing of glad child-voices, followed the announcement.

Five pretty children, but delicate, and with the hot-house plant look. Howard, a boy of about two years older than his sister, and his brother, and that curled chestnut hair, were like Effie's; but Effie's sunny face, with its rosy cheeks and rosier lips, were all her mothers."

"Now, dear children, we will go down to the shore, or to the park, this afternoon; the day is so beautiful, and the snow-fall of last night has made travelling delightful. Now you will be good, and not play with the fire any more, my boy? Do remember now? I must leave you and Effie here for half an hour. Promise me, Howard, that you will not go too near the grate, or touch any papers there."

"Now you, mother." And the boy meant it, as he put his mouth for his mother's kiss.

Half an hour's "half-hour" of absence doubled and tripled; for she was supervising the dinner which on this occasion was, of course, an hour.

Howard was a restless, daring sort of a boy, delighting greatly in dangerous haphazard adventure, uncertain to place his neck in imminent peril a dozen times each day of his life.

However, behaved remarkably well this New Year's morning. He told Effie the last story he had read in the Child's Cabinet, and then he played "school to you," with commendable patience for an hour, seeing it was a "girl's play," and had an instinctive feeling that it derogated somewhat from his dignity to join these.

But the boy grew very tired, and then, while Effie was "lullaby," he went and stood near the crackling the amber flames coil around the heap of coal.

He took an old paper that lay on the floor, and, "going to light it," he whispered, while a moment of his restless fingers indicated what they fairly ache to do this.

He drew closer he drew to the flames, holding nearer to the little red skeins of flames, and along the edges of the grate, and at last the paper caught one of these. Howard cried with a low, exultant cry; he had lighted it; he had disobeyed his mother.

With his usual recklessness, he ran all about laughing as his little sister cried out in the flames broadened and brightened nearer, and almost scorched his hand, when with it to the grate, and a moment later nothing left of this to tell the story of his sin.

Minutes after Mrs. Young entered the room "Oh, you're doing nicely, children. Have been good boy, and not played with the fire,

I wished he had not done this, as every one sooner or later, for the wrong doing. But it was now. So all the moral cowardice rose up in Young's heart—he blushed and hesitated. "I said his mother gravely, "you know about the ride. Have you played with fire?"

"Mamma." It seemed as if a shiver had crept over Howard's heart, as his lips uttered this

"Howard, what a big story! I saw you run from the room with the paper burning," spoke the voice of Effie.

"Howard, my child, have you told me a falsehood?" the mother, grieved and shocked at this evidence of her son. His burning cheek, his eyes, answered her.

She called him to her side, and talked to him of the sin he had committed against God and his soul. Howard was melted to tears of sorrow and shame, and when his mother rising up said, "You remember, Howard, that I told you not go with us this afternoon, if you disobey," he felt in his soul that hard as was the punishment, he deserved it.

Poor lad, after all, to disappoint the child so he murmured Mrs. Young, as she arranged her hair before the mirror. "I sha'n't enjoy myself thinking of the poor little fellow, left here all alone; it is so natural for him to be in mischief, and I don't think when he told the story."

"But your father knows nothing of it, and I've a good mind to go down to the nursery, and tell Howard he may go."

At the merry "jingling" of the bells broke upon the chamber. It was more than the weak young mother could bear, and so, forgetting all prudent care welfare in the present good, Mrs. Young flew down stairs, and broke into the nursery with these words: "There! make haste, Howard, put your cap and shawl; I've concluded to go this time, after all." She thought, (the fond mother,) that she was repaid, as she saw the little wistful face pressed against the window pane brighten, and bound forward with a "hurrah!"

But it was a pity the mother did not hear Howard's undertone to his sister, as they stood on the door-step, five minutes later. "I don't believe, after all, Effie, "there's any great harm in playing with fire, or telling stories, either; for you see if there had been, mamma wouldn't have said I might go in the end. Then I should like to know if she hasn't told as big a story as I have, because she said at first, I should certainly stay at home?"

Oh! Howard Young, mounting with your bright face and boyish glee into the sleigh, how great a wound has the loving mother that awaits you there, left upon your soul!

And now, loving, tender-hearted, self-sacrificing mother, who shall read this tale, has it no lesson for you?

Remember your daily life is writing its inerasable inscriptions upon the hearts of your children, and that you are responsible for that weak tenderness which regards more their present enjoyment than their future good; which does not discipline and prepare them for the work and the storms that must come!

"Verily I say unto you, you shall not lose your reward!"
