PART III.

THE KID-GLOVE SHEPHERD.

[illegible]ion at Iviole, was well constructed and [illegible] for the handling of large mobs, or [illegible]eep. There were large picket corrals [illegible]g pens; a spacious shearing floor and [illegible]se;—and to any one approaching this [illegible] a chaos of many voices, intermingled [illegible]ing of shears, and the baa of a multi[illegible], proclaimed that the work of [illegible] was going on.

[illegible]ng man with the heavy sombrero and [illegible] was directing a gang of shearers; the [illegible] native Hawaiians, but a few [illegible] foreigners.

[illegible]k went gaily on; enlivened by a great [illegible]aff and banter. A shearer having laid [illegible]; now springs forward into a pen full of [illegible]oining the shearing floor, to capture [illegible]unwilling contributor of wool. With [illegible]p, the shearer seizes a hind leg among [illegible]ost of the wooly victims, who huddle [illegible] way. With right hand grasping the [illegible]ith his left grasping the wooly back of [illegible]ce, he drags the animal onward till he [illegible] his place on the floor. He then sets [illegible]p on its haunches, holding its head [illegible] knees; and then with his wide jawed [illegible]ch as were used in Jason's time and [illegible] we see in old sculpture, that the [illegible] for clipping the threads of human [illegible]gins at the neck, and deftly inserting [illegible] of his shears, and snipping short [illegible]ly, he soon rolls a rich creamy and [illegible]g fleece from off neck and shoulders; [illegible] he reaches the broad well wooled [illegible]sides, his keen blades take a longer [illegible]ent a wider swathe; and after about [illegible], he has turned loose a bare, clipped [illegible] spread out on the floor, a soft tinted [illegible] its inner side a blending of [illegible] gold, as the sparkling yelk glistens [illegible]owy fibre of the fleece. And this he [illegible]ffes and places away on a fleecy pile.

[illegible]g stranger Louis standing near the [illegible] work, had been steadily and earnest[illegible]g the operations of catching and [illegible]

[illegible]g man with the heavy sombrero, [illegible]sternly, cried out:

"[illegible]e looked long enough to see how [illegible] done; now take off those gloves, [illegible] if you intend to earn your salt." [illegible]e a start, as though he were stung; [illegible] quick rush among the sheep in the [illegible]tuously seized one by the hind leg, [illegible]vement called forth a general mur[illegible] the natives; "akamai no," he's [illegible] the sheep on end, as the others [illegible] grasping a pair of shears with [illegible] hand, began to snip at the fleece; [illegible]ed and chopped the wool, as he went [illegible]pped several snips of skin out of the [illegible]

These mishaps did not daunt him, [illegible] progress; but after a while the yelk, [illegible]ense of the wool, of which there is [illegible]eight, or more in every fleece of a [illegible]heep, had saturated his gloves, and [illegible]grip of the shears very slippery and [illegible]he bare handed shearers, whose [illegible]e slippery with this yelky grease, [illegible]been in the dust of the pen, in order [illegible]heir grip—and the overseer watch[illegible]ggles of the new hand, cried out in [illegible]ce.

"[illegible] kid gloves, you want a little dry [illegible] your hands to get a better hold." [illegible]ame, Howard," said the ranchero, [illegible] upon the floor, "don't insult a [illegible] trying to do his best, and who may [illegible] reasons of health, for keeping his [illegible]d."

[illegible]ed forward towards his employer; [illegible] tremor on his lips, said; "pardon, [illegible] have undertaken to do some things [illegible] not qualified. But I think, sir, [illegible] domain of yours, there are many [illegible] which I could serve you better than [illegible]

[illegible] walked with the young man a [illegible]part, and as he showed in his face an [illegible] of kindly consideration, Louis spoke [illegible] touch of feeling, as he imparted these [illegible]

"[illegible] deceiver, sir, as I told you; and in a [illegible]on, but not with any view to injure. [illegible]ed my back on a mother, and dissap[illegible]her hopes in me. I have done this [illegible] and been disobedient to her most [illegible]eirs; and yet I remember and ob[illegible] of her teachings; one of which was, [illegible]uld care for the purity of my hands [illegible] the purity of my soul. And it [illegible] to me like a religion to cherish and [illegible] of these minor instructions of my [illegible] though I have done violence to her [illegible] weightier matters of life."

[illegible]d walked on towards the house, [illegible] brought forth a few pairs of [illegible] handed to Louis, saying; "[illegible]ur mother; 'let it be [illegible] your whole life, as well as for your [illegible] these, with which you can serve [illegible] horseback, than on the shearing [illegible] with Lono, who has a spare [illegible]nd help him to watch the flocks, [illegible] of the mountain."

[illegible]he hand of his employer, in both [illegible] it a fervent pressure; and then [illegible] the native man Lono.

[illegible], the native sheep owners, who [illegible], adjoining the ranch of Iviole, [illegible] aggressive. They claimed a [illegible] a certain land of the ranch; [illegible]ugh unjust, had a certain color [illegible] minds of the native shepherds,—[illegible]mpted to an assertion of their [illegible] a cunning native lawyer, who [illegible]ly off their flocks, whilst he [illegible] to encroach upon others. These [illegible]ering about thirty, had united [illegible], in one large mob or herd; and [illegible]together, resolved to drive their [illegible] disputed territory, and establish [illegible] the ranch of Iviole.

[illegible] past, the ranchero and his peo[illegible] enabled to check these intrusive [illegible]hilst they operated single handed; [illegible] they were united, they presented a serious obstacle to the prosperity of the ranch.

On one occasion young Howard with a company of six men, part natives and part foreigners were riding around the ranch to drive in sheep, when they encountered in a mountain gorge, within the disputed territory, the band of raiding shepherds descending the gorge. The pass was narrow, and an encounter could not be avoided.

Howard called out to them, that as trespassers they would be prosecuted according to law. The raiders laughed derisively;—their leader, Kawaonahele, saying, the law never reached the mountain retreats of Iviole, and they were now going to take the law into their own hands, and thrash him and his party.

As he ceased speaking Kawaonahahele, threw his lasso at one of the ranchmen, and missing the head of the man caught on the broad pommel of his saddle; and the chief of the raiders, putting spurs to his horse, dragged down the ranchman's horse, amid the jeers and shouts of his crowd. There was now an indiscriminate throwing of lassos;—and sticks and stones had been gathered and were thrown with desperate energy on both sides;—the small party of ranchmen, though facing the storm resolutely at first; yet after a while completely overwhelmed, were turning their horses heads down the ravine, to fly before the triumphant raiders.

During the melee, none of the combatants had noticed a crackling of twigs in the dense shrubbery on one side of the ravine, nor observed occasional glimpses of three horsemen, working their way down to the floor of the gorge; but as the ranchmen were putting spurs to their horses to fly; and Howard was leading his men away from what he deemed a hopeless fight; he heard a rousing cry, "hold on?" and saw Louis, with a face aflame with the spirit of battle, and spurring onward his horse, while he held a long sapling stem in his hand like a lance in rest, with which he charged into the thick of the advancing raiders with a terrible shout, and unhorsed the first man he encountered. Howard and his men encouraged by the reinforcement rallied, and closing in with the furious onset of Louis, and his two companions, broke the front of the band of marauders. And now, Howard who was one of the famous lassooers of the islands, restored to hope and courage, slung his unerring thong over his head, and cast the noose around the neck of Kawaonahele; then giving a quick spur to the noble grey he bestrode, brought the marauder to the ground. At the fall of their leader, the checked, and baffled gang gave way; they broke, and scattered in disorder, making their way in different directions up both sides of the ravine, and left their chief in the hands of the ranchmen, who took him along with them, as their prisoner.

As the party cantered along down, over the springy fern and moss covered turf of the bed of the gorge, Howard riding up to Louis, held out his hand, saying; "Will you let me take back all I said about the kid gloves." And Louis taking the proffered hand, said smiling: "You see my heart has not got gloves on."

The result of this encounter, was the trial of the leader of the marauders for trespass and assault, and the breaking up of the depredations.

But a broad ranch like this abounding in forest and mountain fastnesses, had many enemies to contend with; and among these, at one time, doing great mischief and dangerous, were the wild hogs of the mountain. They came to the camping grounds of the sheep at night, and devoured the lambs. There were on the island large black, heavy bristled boars of unusual ferocity, that would charge upon a horseman at sight, and required a pack of dogs to hold them at bay.

Louis and his men, with their dogs had started a grand sanglier, showing a broad black back with a bristling ridge and long white tusks curving out like sickles from the foaming jaws of the grunting infuriate monster. The dogs were barking furiously within the cover. Louis became impatient. He advanced with a pole in hand, with his large knife blade fastened at one end like a boar spear. Lono bade him beware; that the boar would charge from the cover, and that his spear would not stop him. The young man advanced stooping to get a view of the beast, as he advanced within the brush. There was a loud snort; a yelp of a dog in pain; a rush of the great boar through the close tangled chapparal; and charging upon the young man, the furious creature knocked the rude spear out of his hand, and ripping him with his sharp tusks, tore a severe gash in his leg, and prostrated him. The boar then turned, and set a forefoot upon the fallen man, and was about to tear and rip open his body, when the fierce clamor of dogs at his head held him momentarily in check. As he stood thus, fore feet on the helpless and paralyzed young man, and champing a mass of foam out of his huge jaws, a whizzing sound came through the air, and on the instant, the noose of a rawhide thong was cast around the neck of the boar, and the other end was quickly drawn around the stem of a stout bush; and being hauled on by two or three stout men, the wild beast was soon entangled, fastened, and dispatched.

Howard and his men, who had come at the well known bark of the dogs, now raised up Louis, and giving him a little water from a ranch cantine, soon had him restored, and his leg bandaged. The severity of the boar's stroke laying bare the sinews, had completely benumed him, as he fell. The tusks were taken out of the monster. They measured a little over seven inches from root to point. They were white like ivory, and had sharp angular points like a graver's carving tool.

"These are your trophies," said Louis to Howard; as he held the tusks in his hand; "but I beg them of you; that I may some day send them to friends, who have hunted the wild boar in Bohemia and the Carpathians; to show them that this noble hunting beast, attains as fierce proportions in the mountain gorges of the Hawaiian Island, as in the forest fastnesses of Europe, and that my mother may keep them, as relics of her son's rescue from death." And he grasped the hand of Howard warmly as he spoke.

The latter replied laughingly: "You cannot balk one of our big boars with your charge and battle cry, like you did a squad of sheep thieves; but I say, if you want to learn to throw the lass', as well as I do, you will have to take off your gloves."

And Louis lived on in favor with the ranchero and all his people. He proved himself a brave and valuable man. And he was content with his new life, but at times a great unrest and yearning disturbed him, and he would ascend a ridge overlooking the ocean, and look wistfully, as though he expected some form of beauty, of his hopes and imagination, to rise up out of the glistening blue of the broad Pacific main, and come to him.

And one sweet, calm, gently breezy day, as he stood thus gazing, he heard a horse's tramp near by, and turning, saw a very pretty, graceful looking girl, with complexion of delicate brunette; tastefully robed, like one coming from the city, and quite an apparition of beauty on that lonely island, and on that wild mountain ridge. She approached him with a smiling expression. Her confidence and air of innocent assurance increased his wonderment beyond measure. And when she stopped her horse, and manifested by her movements, that she was going to alight; he, although breathless with surprise, and conflicting emotions; yet quickly removed his glove from his well shaped right hand, with which he proffered to assist her; but she sprang to the ground, and stood before him with a smiling face.
