A Scene in the Police Court.

On Saturday morning last at the usual matinal gathering at the Hall of Justice on King street, there were His Honor, the Crown Prosecutor and the Counsel for the defence, but the dock was empty. At the usual hour, 9 o'clock, His Honor took his seat on the bench and bowed to the right and left in his customary polite and dignified manner. The acting Attorney-General rose, and with a serious demeanor that becomes the important position that he holds, he gravely announced to the Court that there was an entirely "clean sheet" before him, and there was nothing left to do but to adjourn the Court. Mr. John Russell who is always prepared to differ from his learned friend, grasped the situation immediately. Drawing himself up to his full height and placing himself in that peculiar attitude so well known to his clients when he is about to make an eloquent address with the object of releasing them from the clutches of the law, he respectfully asked that there be at least some record of the "day's doings."

Mr. Russell said it need not necessarily be criminal in its character, but proposed that it be of a nature complimentary in its character to His Honor. After some further introductory remarks he said he was delighted to find an occasion that nothing criminal in its character had developed since the previous session of the Court to demand the attention of the Court to-day. He regarded it as a most happy augury of the future, and hoped that many days would bear such an impress, to wit: absence of crime. Mr. Russell further said that he had a duty to perform, not only in recognition of the fact as he had just stated, but also to carry out the custom of other countries under a similar condition of circumstances, and which was to present to His Honor, the presiding justice, a pair of white kid gloves in recognition of the auspicious event. Mr. Russell did so, and with the presentation, offered some further remarks to the Court.

His Honor graciously accepted of the presentation and was pleased to say that this was an opportunity for him to agree with what had been described by Mr. Russell as an auspicious event and a happy augury for the future, and added that the presentation was exceedingly appropriate on account of the well known relations of Mr. Russell to the criminal business of the country. The affair was exceedingly happy and opportune.

The Court then adjourned in the usual way.

Dinner-Table Decoration.

[FROM A LONDON FASHION LETTER.]

Dinner-table decoration continues to exercise the ingenuity of all domestic artists, and new designs, each seeming more lovely than the last, attract attention and command our admiration. Plush, bordered with chenille fringe, is sometimes used in place of centre strips of colored satin or silk and good taste frequently suggests the use of flowers of a single color, mingled with green foliage only, instead of the commingling of many tints, however well contrasted. Deep yellow flowers, with dark green foliage of any kind, are most effective. Large china bowls placed at intervals down the centre of a table previously covered with a strip of green satin and filled as I have described are exquisite. A tall specimen glass with a single rosebud and a bit of feathery-foliage, such as the asparagus plant or common carrot will supply, should be placed to the right of each guest. Large single blooms such as dahlias, peonies, sunflowers, are in great favor for table as well as for room decoration generally. Brocaded satin sometimes is used for the centre of a dinner table. I have seen a rich amber and brown brocade that produced a very happy effect, the selected flowers being mosty of a deep red color. Just now there is a craze for using colored glass dishes or miniature vases of various shapes, which are sold in sets of six, eight or twelve; the set comprises glass tinted in every new and artistic shade, and when the flowers chosen to fill them afford a good contrast a most charming result is arrived at. The glasses are placed either at the four corners and midway at the sides of the tables, or otherwise may be arranged in a circle round the centrepiece; or if there be none this pretty-colored bouquet of glasses may be arranged to form a centre. A very tasteful effect is produced by arranging water lilies, flags, and bullrushes in glass caskets of good size, dark green plush beneath giving the appearance of a bed of moss. I have the strip of plush bordered with buttercups, or oxeye daisies, laid flat on the edge, with the introduction of leaves or not, as was thought decorative or the reverse.

AUSTRALIA.

The Journal of Commerce says that the Australians are and have been excited over the refusal of the home government to back them up in their attempt at annexation in the Pacific. They wanted New Guinea, that is, all of it that the Dutch did not lay claim to, and wanted to put a stop to further European annexation in the Pacific. In other words, they covet all these islands for Australia, and aim to rect a Southern Empire that shall ultimately include all that has been known on the maps as Australasia, Malaysia, and Western Oceanica. It is an an ambitious dream, but it possesses them and they are hard at work attempting its realization. On the 5th December last a convention met at Sydney, in which not only the Australian colonies, but New Zealand and the Fiji Islands, was represented by official delegates of the respective Governments, together with influential and distinguished citizens. Of seven resolutions passed by the Convention the following especially deserve attention: "The further acquisition of dominion in the South Pacific by any foreign power" is pronounced "highly injurious to Australasia and the empire." This is obviously a counterpart of the Monroe doctrine, and conveys a distinct warning to Holland, France and Spain. Next, the home government is informed that "the Conference desires the immediate incorporation of all that part of New Guinea which is not claimed by the Dutch Government," and the Conference also "urges the expediency of negotiating with France, in order to gain the control of the New Hebrides." These measures may involve the expenditure of money, but the Australasian colonies are careful, it will be observed, to offer to bear their part of it. "The Governments represented at the Conference will recommend to their Legislatures a measure of permanent appropriation defraying, according to population, such share of the cost incurred as the Imperial Government may deem fair." Here we have the basis laid for a common treasury, and there is something like the germ of a common parliament in a subsequent report of the Conference favoring a "Federal Council, to deal with matter in which united action mas be desirable," and directing the preparation of a "bill for the constitution of this Council, which the Imperial Government will be requested to carry through."

It is not likely that the Imperial Government will assent to this recommendation now, but the time will come when they will be glad to do so, or to witness something in the shape of united action on the part of the colonies, resembling that of the American colonies over a century ago. There is a strong republican sentiment in Australia, and it would need only some disappointment of the kind referred to, to strengthen it immensely.

Our principal interest in this matter is in regard to trade matters. The foreign commerce, principally with Great Britain, has an annual value of five hundred millions of dollars, and is steadily increasing. They have 7,000 miles of railroad, nearly all controlled by the Colonial Governments, and 50,000 miles of telegraph, all controlled by them. They are advancing by rapid strides to a first place in the agricultural ranks, as they raise thirty million bushels of wheat twenty million bushels of oats, six million bushels of corn, and a million and a half gallons of wine, yearly. They are amongst the greatest wool producers of the world. Our climates are the opposites of theirs—our winter their summer, and vice versa. This ought to give rise to a profitable interchange of commodities, such as fruits etc., peculiar to the season, provided a method of making them stand the ocean carriage, was adopted.

Out of $500,000,000 of yearly trade, San Francisco should be able to enjoy a handsome share.

"Mother," said a little boy, the other day, "I know what I would do if I was at sea, and all the men were starving, and they should draw lots who should be killed and eaten, and it should come to me. I'd jump into the water." "But," said the mother, "they would soon fish you up." "Ah," said he, "but I wouldn't bite!"
