INDIANA STATE SENTINEL.

From the Natchez Free Trader.

Henry Clay against the Defenders of the Country.

In the early part of the present canvass a pre-concerted effort was made by the whig orators all over the State, to show that Col. Polk had voted against paying the soldiers of the Revolution. We referred to the journals of Congress, page by page, and session after session, and proved that the charge was false. Not only that it was false, but that he had steadily supported the claims of those old soldiers, and that it was mainly through his exertions, that a bill was passed to pension the brave old men who fought in our Indian wars. But how stands Mr. Clay in these matters? Has he uniformly been the friend of our brave warriors? Very far from it. We all remember the efforts he made in Congress, week after week, to tarnish the splendid military career of Gen. Jackson, and drive him, in disgrace from the army, and that too, when the tomahawk of the savage was dripping with blood along our whole western frontier, and the war-whoop resounded from the Chatahoochie to the Tombigbee. He stood up at that crisis, when so many families in Mississippi were in mourning for their murdered relatives, and took the side of Arbuthnot and Ambrister, the British spies that had instigated the Indians. He defended them and the treacherous Spanish authorities of Pensacola, who furnished the savages with arms, against Andrew Jackson, the man who, under God, saved this whole region of country from butchery and conflagration. Not is this all. He gave, more recently, another memorable instance of ingratitude and opposition to the brave defenders of his country. It is well known that from the close of the Revolutionary war, our commerce in the Mediterranean was harassed and our flag constantly insulted by the Barbary powers, those licensed pirates that held the fertile coast of Africa and levied contributions on almost every nation. We paid them an enormous and disgraceful tribute for a series of years for exemption from these depredations, but even this did not protect us. At length the spirit of the nation was aroused, and in 1803, an expedition was sent out, under Commodore Preble, who blockaded and bombarded the fortress of Tripoli. In the course of the attack, the U. S. frigate Philadelphia, commanded by the gallant Bainbridge, struck on a rock in the harbor and was captured by the enemy and her officers and crew, amounting to three hundred persons, were made prisoners. The dungeons of Tripoli literally groaned with Americans who were subjected to every indignity, and daily menaced with impalement. The late Commodore Decatur, then a lieutenant in the navy, obtained permission a few months afterwards, to make an attempt to cut out the captured frigate then lying in the enemy's harbor. He sailed from Syracuse with a crew of volunteers, on the American Ketch Intrepid. He reached the harbor about 10 o'clock at night, and prepared for an immediate assault. The Philadelphia, with her guns mounted and loaded lay under the batteries of the castle; two Tripolitan cruisers lay within a cabl'se length on her starboard bow. The Intrepid carend her gallant crew within two hundred yards of der frigate, without interruption; they were hailed athi ordered to anchor. The pilot on the Intrepid answered, by Decatur's order, that they had lost their anchors in a gale of wind off the coast, and could not anchor. By this time they had approached near the frigate and were boarded. Decatur directed a small boat to take a rope, and make it fast to the fore chains of the frigate; this being done, the crew began to warp the Intrepid alongside. Up to this moment the enemy had suspected no danger; but now, in great confusion, they began to prepare for defence. Decatur, followed by his officers and crew, sprang on board. A furious conflict ensued. The two cruisers opened their fire. But the Americans soon cleared the decks, set the frigate on fire, and retreated out of the harbor. For this heroic act Congress voted him thanks and a sword. The following Spring, Commodore Preble determined to make another attack on Tripoli, and gave the command of a division of gun boats to Decatur. The signal being given, Decatur advanced to attack the Tripolitan gun boats, which were moored along the mouth of the harbor, and within musket shot of the batteries. He ordered the bowsprits of his whole line to be unshipped and every preparation made to board the boats of the enemy; he then advanced through a heavy fire from the battery and gun boats, and boarded one of the boats with twenty-seven Americans; the deck was soon cleared, and Decatur was about to take his prize out of the Line when a boat which had been commanded by his brother, Lieut. James Decatur, came under his stern, and he was informed, that his brother after capturing one of the enemy's boats, had been treacherously slain by her commander, who was then making for the port. He waited to hear no more, but hastened to overtake the assassin, and avenge his brother. With his single boat he pursued the retreating foe beyond the line of the enemy; he succeeded in laying his boat along side, and drew himself on board with eleven of his men, all the Americans he had left. The fight continued on the deck for twenty minutes, and but four of his men remained unwounded. He now singled out the commander, who was the special object of his vengeance. With his cutlass he attempted to cut off the head of the enemy with which his antagonist was armed; but the treacherous steel broke at the hilt, and he received a wound in the right arm and breast. They then closed, and after a fierce struggle both fell. The pirate attempted to stab him with a dagger; but Decatur seized his arm with his left hand, and with his right brought a belt pistol to bear on his antagonist, fired and killed him.

During this struggle, one of the Tripolitans behind Decatur, aimed a blow at his head with a sabre; an American seaman, who had been so severely wounded as to lose the use of both hands, rushed under the uplifted blade, and received the blow upon his own head. Both the Tripolitan boats were finally secured by Decatur. His subsequent brilliant career, in the war with Great Britain, and again on the coast of Africa, is too well known to be repeated. Years afterwards, when our country was repeaing in honorable peace, the fruit of these heroic exertions of our army and marine; when the treasury was overflowing with money, and not a dollar of national debt remained unpaid; when Decatur had fallen, and most of the gallant band that accompanied him were dead, leaving their helpless widows and orphans in poverty and wretchedness, a bill was introduced to make some provision for them, and on the test question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" HENRY CLAY, with only nine others, (all whigs but one) VOTED IN THE NEGATIVE! See Senate Journal, 1st Ses. 24th Cong.

This bill was introduced at the instance of the widows of the veteran Preble, the gallant Lawrence and others; and of James Ware, John F. Blye and others, surviving seamen of the frigate Philadelphia, who were cast destitute upon the charity of the country. Yet Mr. Clay could reject the widow's prayer, and turn his back upon the brave men that had burnished our flag with unfading glory, while he was voting away thousands and thousands of dollars, for extravagant and useless objects.

The New York True Sun, speaking of the late Joseph Bonaparte, and his residence in this country very truly and significantly observes:—

"It is a remarkable circumstance that the revolution in France of 1803 drove to the United States the present King of the French and his brother, and also Talleyrand, and they all lived at Philadelphia, frequently in want of a dollar, or a dinner. Had the good but unfortunate Louis XVI. escaped when he made the attempt, he would in all probability have found himself safe in this country, and we should have had the Bourbon and the Orleans dynasties seeking an asylum in a Republic whose example, operating upon the Reformers of France, had actually drawn them for protection to the very country which had been the real cause of all those troubles. So with Napoleon, who was the child of that Revolution; he also was anxious to come to the United States after the battle of Waterloo—strange that unfortunate monarchs should only find themselves safe in a government of the people, where every man is a sovereign."

HUNGARY.—Prince Maurice, who is in Hungary, had been hunting in the vicinity of his residence. A neighboring nobleman happened to meet one of the Prince's huntsmen on his ground, and immediately shot him. The Prince, being informed of the circumstance, hastened, accompanied by a servant, to the nobleman, and remonstrated with him. "A Hungarian nobleman," he replied "is master of life and death, on his own estate, and you shall immediately have another proof of it." Saying this, the Hungarian shot the Prince's innocent servant. The Prince, excited by this barbarous act, drew out a loaded pistol and shot the nobleman, who died on the spot. The German Prince is still confined in a Hungarian Fortress.—English paper.

True Enough.

In a letter from Mr. Clay written to Mr. Clayton and read by him at the recent Whig meeting in Lancaster, the following passage occurs:

"Your supposition is right as to the oppressive extent of my correspondence. It is utterly impossible to answer all the letters which I receive. I am afraid that I cannot reply to many that deserve it. Mr. Madison once remarked to me that Mr. Jefferson's correspondents were killing him; but they were furnished by a population of about ten millions. Mine are supplied by a population of near twenty millions. I can feel and conceive the possibility of a homicide, committed in the mode which Mr. Madison suggested."

Mr. Clay is certainly right for once. The homicide to which he refers, is very likely to come to pass, for his own letters are helping to kill the author with great rapidity—the three Texas letters, for instance, as well as those to Bronson, Merriwether and others; letters which "make faces" on every side, and cannot result otherwise than in a wry face to himself and friends. Why do not his friend demand a 'committee,' after the fashion of 1840?—Pennsylvanian.

Democrats! To carry the Presidential election triumphantly, in November, you have but two things to do.

First, bring your whole force to the polls.

The country is with you; let the people speak out and the day is ours. With a perfect organization to effect these two objects, you have the election, if not a word more of argument were spoken and published. Without it, argument may be unavailing.

Go to work. Do not omit argument; it is always a powerful auxiliary; but "WE MUST TOIL IF WE WOULD WIN!"—Kendall's Expositor.
