NEW-YORK TRIBUNE.

From the Boston Atlas.

A Female Crusoe.

Off the coast of Alta California, about two degrees distant, bearing nearly West from Point San Pedro, which is in the latitude of 33 43 N. and longitude 118 14 W. will be found a small island, called by the Spaniards Saint Nicholas. This island was formerly inhabited by an inoffensive, indolent race of Indians, who subsisted almost entirely upon fish which they caught from the rocks, and muscles which they found in the sands of the beach. They were a listless, quiet race of beings, who seldom had communication with others of the human family, and who had but few wants and fewer cares.

About the year 1818 or '20, the Russians, from their settlements at the North, landed on this island a party of Kodiac Indians, for the purpose of hunting the sea Otter which at that period abounded in those waters. This party remained on the island for more than two years; and were the means of sowing the seeds of disease and contention among its unsuspecting and unsophisticated inhabitants.

Some ten or twelve years after the departure of the Kodiacs, this tribe had become diminished to about twenty or thirty individuals, when the Governor of the department of California sent over a small vessel and removed them to the main.

In the last boat which was embarking with the last of this people, (some six or eight perhaps in number) to convey them to the vessel, which was to carry them from the home of their nativity forever, was one of the tribe, small in stature, not far advanced in years, and his dusky mate, then in the bloom of life. The order had been given to shove from the shore; the oars had dipped in the wave; the boat was rising on the foaming surf, then breaking on the beach with awful roar, when with the impulse of the moment as it were, this young and blooming bride of the red man, the imprint of whose footstep had been the last left on the sands of her island home, waved an adieu to her chosen mate, plunged into the abyss, "strove through the surge," and, in another moment, stood alone on the shores of her native land. She turned, to give the last lingering look to her departing help-mate; and then, gathering round her form her flowing mantle, wet by the ocean wave, in an instant disappeared forever from the sight of her astonished and sorrowing companions.

The vessel weighed anchor, spread her canvas; and, in forty-eight hours, this remnant of the inhabitants of San Nicholas were landed on Point San Pedro, houseless and forlorn.

From that period to the present—if she be not dead, or has not left within the past eighteen months—has resided alone, on the Isle of San Nicholas, this female Crusoe, the monarch of all she surveys. She preferred to part even with her chosen mate, and sever every human tie that could be binding, rather than leave the home of her birth—that lonely little Isle, that had been to her a world, which she cared not to exchange for the abode of civilized man, with all its promised luxuries.

Since our Crusoe became the sole monarch of the Isle, San Nicholas has been visited perhaps ten or twelve different times, by different individuals; but there she has continued to be found, with none to dispute her right—alone, solitary and forsaken.

Her dress, or covering, is composed of the skins of small birds, which she kills with stones, and sews them together with a needle of bone and the light sinews of the hair seal, sometimes found dead among the rocks. Her only food is a shell fish, of the muscle species, with now and then a still smaller fish, which the surf sometimes throws on the beach. She never remains long in one spot; but is constantly wandering around the shores of the Island, sleeping, which she seldom does, in small caves and crevices in the rock.

During the few last years, it has been very difficult to obtain communication with her. At the approach of the white man she flees, as from an evil spirit; and the only way to detain her is by running her down, as you would the wild goat of the mountain or the young fawn of the plains.

Those who have seen her at the latest period, report that she appears to have lost all knowledge of language; that she makes only a wild noise, altogether inhuman; and when taken and detained against her will, becomes frightened and restless; that the moment she is liberated, she darts off, and endeavors to secrete herself in the wild grass, or among the rocks which hang over the never ceasing surf.

Every endeavor has been made, and every inducement offered, by different individuals, to prevail upon her to leave the island, but in vain. The only home she appears to desire is her own little isle. Her last hope, if she has any, is to finish her journey alone. She has no wish, now, to hear again the sweet music of speech. Its sounds are no longer music to her ear; and as for civilized man, his tameness is shocking even to her dormant senses.

To all appearance, she is strong, healthy, and content to be alone. What can reconcile her to her lot, who can conjecture? Humanity may hope that contentment may continue to be hers to the last hour; for she is destined to lie down and die alone, on the cold shore of her isolated home, with no one to administer to her last wants, and none to cover her cold body, when the spirit shall have left the clay.

But the story of our Crusoe's chosen mate, the companion of her early life, has yet to be told. He saw her for the last time, as we have stated, when she stood alone on the shores of her own Isle; when the boat with himself and his companions was dashing through the wild surf, that broke in uninterrupted succession against the rocks which encircled the resting place of his fathers, and which he was then leaving for ever. With the remnant of the family from San Nicholas, our hero was landed at San Pedro, and there left, whith the others who had accompanied him, to find a home in that land of strangers.

San Pedro, it may be known, is a bleak, barren, bluff point, running out into the blue waters of the Pacific, on which no verdure is to be seen, and but one solitary abode of man, rising amid the desolation which surrounds it. The Pueblo de los Angelos is situated ten leagues distant, with one farm house between the one on the point and those of the town. The mission of San Gabriel lies yet farther on, some three or four leagues where, at that time, might be found, perhaps three or four hundred converted Indians.

But our hero, as he may be called, never left the beach on which he was first landed. Alone and friendless, there he remained, an isolated being, till life ceased to animate his frame. True it is, that several times he was induced, and once or twice forced, to venture as far as the pueblo and even the mission of San Gabriel; but he always, as soon as at liberty, returned and resumed his old station on the beach, or fixed himself on the rocks which hung around the Point. And there he might always be seen, a solitary outcast, as it were, and more constantly when the sun was going down, with his eyes gazing on that celestial orb as it sunk into the western horizon, a direction which he well knew pointed to the lost but never forgotten home of his nativity.

With difficulty he sustained the wants of nature by fishing about the rocks, gathering muscles, and sometimes receiving a scanty pittance of corn from the house on the Point, or a few pence from a passing stranger.

He studiously avoided, as far as possible, all intercourse with his fellow men, and sought to live and die in solitude; and so did he continue to live a life which manifestly appeared a burthen to him, till one morning, as the sun rose, not two years past, his body was found upon the beach a stiffened corpse, stretched out, and bleaching, as it were, in the white foam of the surf, which was thrown about his lifeless remains as the mighty wave broke on the shore.

It is presumed his death was accidental—that while searching for shell fish, in the night, among the cliffs, he must have fallen from an eminence, and thus terminated his solitary existence.

The New Charter....No. 2.

To the Editor of The Tribune:

The New Constitution makes it the duty of the Legislature to provide for the organization of cities, &c. and to restrict their power of taxation, assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit, so as to prevent abuses in assessments and in contracting debt, &c. Yet the main feature of the New Charter is its placing the Common Council supreme over the City, entirely independent of the State Legislature. The Address of the Convention declares the judgment of its members, that "they ought not to endanger the rights and privileges now possessed by the City by again submitting them to Legislative ordeal." In view of this contrast between what the New Constitution requires, and what the proposed Charter allows, it is the less surprising that it should be actually provided in the 11th section of the 1st article of the Charter that the Common Council shall have power to pass all such proper laws, &c. for the good government, &c. of the City as are or may not be prohibited by the Constitutions of the United States, the State of New-York, &c. (See page 9 of the official copy printed by order of the Convention.) This design being understood at the outset, the real operation of the amendments will be the more clearly seen.

In the first place, there is to be an Alderman for each Ward, and an Assistant Alderman for each District of a certain extent, at first 18 Aldermen and 40 Assistant Aldermen. The Aldermen shall each have $400 per annum, and the Assistants $250 each. This is very well for the Legislature to pass and set upon. But the Common Council may afterward divide the city into Common Council Districts, each of which shall afterward have an Alderman, and whenever any amendment shall be adopted by two-thirds of each Board, and carried at the election, it shall become a part of the City Charter. Very well.—Politicians want to be Aldermen, and Aldermen want salaries. The Common Council will immediately increase the number of Aldermen, and two-thirds of the members will of course (why not?) vote to increase their own salaries, and then the politicians will carry it at the election. No man who knows how these things are done can doubt it. There is no State Legislature to submit it to for revision and judgment. There is no bar between the office-holders and the people. The additional expense of this one measure will be enormous.—It is quite interesting to observe how carefully the Charter secures to Common Council men all they have, while providing for what more they may receive. "Nothing contained in this Charter shall be construed to deprive any Alderman or Assistant Alderman of any compensation to which he may be entitled by virtue of his office."

Again: The Common Council shall have exclusive power to impose taxes on the city. It is of immense importance to men in office that they should escape the terrible "Legislative ordeal" to which they are every year subjected at Albany. We all know that we are very heavily taxed, and that a considerable amount of money is wasted for party and private purposes. And it is known to some that great care is taken at each annual estimate to avoid alarming the Legislature by too bold a face in asking for money, and much skill is required to put a good appearance on the various items of expenditure. It is known too, that at each session of the Legislature a corps of official gentlemen are dispatched to Albany to lobby the tax bill through the Legislature, and the City Treasury is duly charged with a handsome bill for the service, including the champaigne and oysters. Now with all this the Common Council have not always succeeded in effecting their object.—Some lynx eyed citizen has more than once, by his presence at Albany, although without the influence of official station obtained alterations in the proposed tax laws quite to the advantage of the city. Such experience has led to a determination in certain quarters, to escape if possible the "Legislative ordeal" of which the Convention delegates complain so bitterly. Surely, in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird. J. S.
