THOU ART GONE FROM ME, MOVE!

BY LAURA LOHMIER.

The night wind's low lute-tones
Are whispering along,
Over summer's bright flower-buds
A passionate song.
It bends its cool lips
On each beautiful bloom,
Till its breathings are rich
With a weight of perfume;
But my heart keeps a vigil
Crushed pledges above,
And it moans as it watches:
"Thou 'rt gone from me, love!"

Those visions of glory
Which charmed me have flown,
My heart's holiest altars
Are fireless and lone;
The eyes which finished worship,
Wild worship in tears,
Have rolled their proud beauty,
And turned from my shrine;
My soul droops its wing,
Like a death-stricken dove,
All mutely and lonely:
"Thou 'rt gone from me, love!"

The starlight still gleams
On the quivering leaves,
The wind-spirit sigh
A low melody weaves;
The flowers, to its kisses,
Still breathe their perfume,
As when, with clasped hands,
We bent over their bloom;
The star-fires still burn
In the temples above,
But they light not my soul:
"Thou 'rt gone from me, love!"

THE MECHANIC'S WIFE;

OR, THE RESULTS OF PERSEVERANCE.

"Well, Augustus," said Marianne, as the former entered a little room, which, without carpet, curtain or ornament of any kind, served as kitchen, sitting room and nursery. "we are really settled down at Bonnes-keeping. Don't it seem comfortable, after so many privations?"

"Yes," answered the young husband, trying to smile, as he glanced, first at his handsome wife and then at the most little pine supper-table, and then at the cradle, where slept a little charming boy of six months. "but mice is such a life of toil that I have no time to enjoy anything—not even to play with Fred."

"But it seems to me," returned the wife, very thoughtfully, "that it need not be just so. We are not in debt; we are both have health, and I am willing to be very economical, in order that we may have time for enjoyment, and improvement too. Say, shall we try the experiment?"

She handed him a cup of tea as she spoke, and looked up into his face with a sweet and hopeful smile; but his face was clouded with a gloom, and the light of heaven in his eye as he answered moodily:

"I don't know how that can be. Every moment taken from my labor is so much taken from our scanty income. I may be allowed to attend places of public amusement; in our present low style of living, we found it hard to pay the first society, and I will never consent to enter any other than good society, if we live alone; and as for improvement, my education was so neglected in my childhood, I have little taste for reading; and besides, we have nothing to read."

"Oh, yes," said the wife, "we have enough to begin with. Here is our beautiful new gift Bible, which we read every morning and evening; and here is our new York paper, with good improving matter enough to last one or two evenings in a week, and you can easily have a share in a public library to fill up the rest."

"But how shall I find time, my good, planning wife?"

"Thank you, Augustus, for the compliment, and now I will plan on: We will rise early, and work diligently all day. Then, if you think you need to work longer, you can bring your work into my room, or I will take Fred into the shop, and one of us will tend and tend the baby while the other works. Won't that be a good plan?"

"I rather think it will," said the husband, beginning to show a little more interest. "but I'm thinking also, that my hesitating and blundering manner of reading will not be very edifying to you. I shall make out sorry work of it."

"Well, suppose you do. I have a Webster's Dictionary, and we will have that open before us, and look out every word of which we do not understand the meaning. If our progress be slow at first, we shall have nobody to laugh at us, and we shall soon find ourselves improving rapidly."

Augustus smiled incredulously, but seemed disposed to encourage his wife to
