THE THREE SCOUTS.

them, morelike demons than men,—shouting, brandishing their sabers, and driving them furiously down the slope, into the water, and into the thickets across the stream.

A body of Federal cavalry, with an infantry support, comes charging after them. The pursuit is kept up, with occasional skirmishing in the rear of the raiders, until a strong force of Rebels, advancing to their protection, charges in turn, and drives the pursuers back.

"My mother!—what will she think?" is Fred's bitter reflection, when all hope of rescue is over. "There isn't much glory in this, is there, boys?"

"It's rascally," says Jake, "to make men travel this way!"

"It's better'n being mowed down on the spot with them pesky sabers," says old Joel. "Hanged if I didn't think 'twas all over with us, one spell. It's all owing to that spy. But, boys, there's one thing,—we may live to see him ketched and hung, yet!"

These words are uttered at intervals, with panting breath; for the poor fellows are well-nigh exhausted with their forced march. The pursuit over, the Rebels slacken their pace, and two or three of the prisoners who have been wounded, are taken upon horses.

"I'll take this boy behind me," says one. "Mount, youngster!"

Fred is seized by the collar; Jake gives him a boost, and he is mounted behind the horseman. "They think I'm wounded," he says to himself, "but never mind the mistake!"

"Here! hello! I'm disabled!" says Jake, hugely discontented with his forced march. "Give us a lift, can't ye?"

"I'll give you a slash over the head, if you don't keep quiet!" answers one of the guard, pricking him on with his sword-point.

III.—A STRANGE RIDE.

Fred had not ridden far behind the horseman, when he perceived that he was becoming separated from his companions. They were hurried on, closely guarded; while the man who had him in charge gradually fell into the rear.

"That was rather a neat operation, Daniels," said an officer, reining up beside them. He was a brigandish-looking man, with long black hair, and a face almost hidden by a thick beard, out of which advanced a stout red nose. He appeared garnished all over with pistols; there were pistols stuck in his belt, and pistols in his holsters, besides a formidable pair which he wore in the legs of his boots.

"Very neat, indeed, captain," replied the man in a voice that sounded strangely familiar to Fred's ear.

"Is that boy badly hurt" asked the captain.

"Not so but that he can ride by holding on to me. Are you faint?"—to Fred.

"No, not very," said Fred, puzzled and astonished.

He tried to remember where he had heard that voice. His guard was clad in the ordinary dress of a citizen, and he wore no sword.

"I must tighten this girth a little, if my horse is to carry double," he said loud enough for the captain's ear, and halted.

He seemed about to dismount. He of the pistols also drew rein, asking if he could be of any assistance.

"No," said Daniels. "I reckon I'll let it go for the present." And he spurred on again, after endeavoring to tighten the girth, without dismounting.

During the brief halt, the distance between them and the main body had materially increased. Moreover, something else had happened, of deep interest to Fred. The horseman, tugging at the strap to which the saddle was buckled, had turned his profile toward his prisoner. Glimpses of the silver east, brightening through the trees, alone upon it, lighting for an instant the russet beard, the calm, resolute face, the deep, quiet eyes, shadowed by the felt hat. It was the same profile Fred had daguerreotyped upon his memory the evening before, when the suspected stranger turned from him, and walked over the hill into the fiery eye of the sunset.

"Joel was right; the man is a spy! 'Twas he that guided the rebels! He had examined our position, and knew just where to make the attack. But I may pay him yet!" The blood rushed violently to Fred's brain, and these were the thoughts that rushed with it.

"Come, Daniels, we shall be left quite behind!" called the officer.

"I am with you," replied Daniels, spurring forward.

A desperate resolve flashed its light into the boy's soul. To be revenged upon this man, and at the same time to escape! Carefully he withdrew his right hand from the horseman's waist, carefully felt with it in his own pocket, and drew forth a knife. It was a stout knife, with a long, pointed blade. He opened it with his teeth, behind the shoulder of the spy. Then, with the handle in his grasp and the blade in his sleeve, he softly returned his hand, now closed, to the horseman's waist, and awaited his chance.

"Perhaps the officer will ride on. Oh, to be one minute alone with this villain! I'll strike him with all my might in his neck, tumble him off, snatch the reins, and away!"

Such were the boy's thoughts, not formed definitely in those words, but passing through his mind in electric flashes.

He saw the possibility of escape clearly enough, provided the officer would take himself out of the way. True, the rebel pickets were passed long ago; it was now broad day; they were in the enemy's country, traveling the open road; and, although it was a good horse they mounted (as he was pleased to observe), he could not hope to gallop back to camp without encountering danger. He seemed to think of everything in an instant of time. He even thought of the glory of such an exploit; and of the delight of writing to his mother about it, when all was over. His plan was firmly outlined in his mind,—to plunge into the woods, and there, abandoning his horse, if necessary, to hide in the thickets from his pursuers, elude the rebel scouts, and make his way back at last, somehow, to the Union lines.

Once more the spy's horse fell behind. The man with the pistols galloped on after his companions. "Let him pass that ridge!" though Fred, thoroughly nerved for his purpose; "and then!" He examined the horseman's neck, and thought where he should strike.

The above is a portion of this new story by Mr. Trowbridge, showing the interest and incident which even the opening chapters contain. It is a book of 400 pages, to which the reader is referred. It has just been published in Boston by Messrs. J. E. Tilton & Co., and the following are notices of the press:

"It is sufficient to say that this is the book in fiction for the civil war. * * * * In after years it must become the standard novel relating to this warlike period."—[New-York Leader.

WAR FICTION.—Mr. Trowbridge's new story, "The Three Scouts," is the best novel of the war we have yet read, and will be equally relished by children and their parents. It is full of adventure and character.—[The Philadelphia Press, J. W. Forney's well-known paper.

TROWBRIDGE'S NEW WAR STORY, "The Three Scouts," has already passed to its tenth thousand, and promises to have a larger sale than "Cudjo's Cave." It is certainly an improvement on that popular book. The passages of description are vivid and brief, the course of the narrative rapid, and the representation of the characters close to nature and life. It is impossible to open the volume at any page without being struck by the quick movement and pervading animation of the story.—[Boston Transcript.

"Mr. Trowbridge's last novel, 'The Three Scouts,' has achieved a wonderful degree of popularity, which even envy must admit to be well won. A tale of the secession war, it abounds in adventure, and is full of those scenes to which such a contest must give rise, in which the valor and genius of daring spirits are happily displayed. Mr. Trowbridge never fatigues his numerous readers by repetition, but from the stores of his inventive mind he draws ever new materials for the maintenance of that interest which he creates at the very beginning of his stories. Never was this peculiarity of his more signally displayed than in 'The Three Scouts,' which, to our mind, is the very best of his clever productions. The book is very handsomely printed."—[Boston Traveller.

"The author of this tale has already attained great popularity by his previous productions in the same line, and this volume is no way inferior to them in romantic and thrilling incidents, hair-breadth escapes, well sustained characters and an exciting plot."—[New-York Observer.
