PARTIES wishing a safe and paying investment for their money, call at once on S. M. Wood & Co. 534 Kansas ave.

"O, no!" Margaret cried, laughing at the reiterated queries and admonitions of her parents. "I sha'n't be lonely. Haven't I grannie? And I'll be sure to barricade the doors. And I'll keep up the sitting-room fire, and cover the plants with newspapers if it turns cold—and everything. Now go, or you will be disgracefully late."

The two persons, muffled up for a long ride, turn again to kiss her warmly, and to look at her beamingly.

"That's a dear child!" the mother said. "You understand, of course, we won't be back much before midnight?"

"Yes. Have a good time!"

The bundled individuals trotted down the path to the gate, and the girl stood in the door-way and watched them climb into the clumsy sleigh, and, with many waves and nods, drive off.

The home of the Lanyons was set in the midst of a fine apple and peach orchard on the side of a hill. It was a common, comfortable old frame house, painted a pale olive—just such a house as you will see any day on a country drive. Now the trees, that made the place in summer a dream of bloom and verdure, were but gaunt, gray, rattling skeletons. There was snow on the bare branches, snow on the deserted nests, snow on the roofs of the house and barns, snow on the undulating stretches around—snow everywhere. But, despite this, there was in the picture no hint of desolation, for the smoke curled up from the chimney in cheery blue spirals, and the girl at the door, in her gay plaid gown, appeared the very embodiment of content and domestic happiness.

She closed the door and returned to the sitting room. The old woman nodding by the fire brightened up as she entered.

"They got off, Margaret?"

"Yes, grannie. But they were extremely doubtful whether or not you and I could take care of ourselves for a few hours. But I fancy we can."

She appeared so strong, and beautiful, and capable, standing straightly there in the winter light, that the good soul by the stove was as loth to take her eyes from the fair vision as were James Lanyon and his wife a short time previous.

"I guess," she chirped, "we'll have a real good time. This room is mighty pleasant, now that you've fixed it up, Margaret."

The girl glanced around. The apartment did indeed look different from what it had on her return home from school a short time ago. A soft rug almost hid the glaring ingrain carpet; some little ash shelves, laden with books, were on the wall; reddish curtains softened the rough outlines of the windows; on the wire stand of house plants, hyacinths and geraniums were in bloom.

"It is as cosy as can be. I hear Philander bringing in the milk. As soon as I have strained it, I shall get your tea."

She went into the kitchen, where Philander, the hired man, was setting down two pails of foaming milk on the table.

"THEY WANT SOME ONE TO HELP THEM."

"Would it matter, Miss Margaret," he asked, "if—when I get the chores done—I walk into town to see if there be a letter in the post office for me from my brother?"

"You may go, but be back early."

"I will that. I know the folks has gone to the silver weddin' over by Murray's."

When Margaret had strained the milk and put it aside, she equipped a tray, which she carried into the sitting-room and put down on the round table at her grandmother's elbow. She went back, steeped the tea, and was in and out several times on various errands. Once she opened the kitchen door and took a look around.

The western sky was all of dull copper, with crimson streaks. The wind had gone down. The bare branches no longer rattled. In the air was a hush and an intense, creeping cold.

"I'll have to look out for the plants to-night of all nights, grannie," she said, as she buttered the old lady's toast. "It is going to be terribly cold."

It did turn out a bitter night. The fire burned blue, and they could hear the frost crackling on the window-panes. The old woman knit and dozed, while Margaret read. It was 9 o'clock. Ten struck, and Philander had not returned.

"Hark!" said Margaret, suddenly.

It was near eleven, and grannie had gone sound asleep in her chair.

"I thought," murmured Margaret, "I heard a cry."

She listened intently.

"There!" she breathed, starting up. "There—again!"

It was a cry, wailing and pitiful—the cry of a frightened and suffering child. And it was accompanied by the frantic beating of small fists on the front door.

The girl's heart quickened at thought of a child out in that stinging cold. She flew to the door, which had been laboriously barricaded, undid the bolts guarding it, and flung it back. A boy of seven or eight almost fell against her, as he stumbled into the hall.

"Poor laddie!" she said, and took hold of the door as if to shut it.

"Don't," he panted, "do that!"

He pointed in the direction of the road winding below. She peered out, the keen cold going through her like a knife.

"They want—some one—to help them," the boy whispered.

She saw now, through the wintry night, the outlines of a vehicle. She did not wait to question the boy further. She drew him into the sitting-room, aroused grannie, offered a few words of explanation, and then, hastily donning a hood and shawl, ran out of the house, down the path, and to the road, in the middle of which was a livery team and a buggy. These she recognized as being from Crandon, the nearest town to the north. The cause of the stoppage was apparent. A wheel had come off. A man on the front seat was restraining the horses with one hand. In his left arm he held an awkward bundle.

"I beg your pardon," said a pleasant, well-modulated voice, "is there no man upat the house who can help me?"

"My father and the hired man are both away. But I can aid you, if you will let me." She was busily unbuckling the horses as she spoke. "There! Now, if you will lead the horses up to the barn, I shall carry your parcel."

A mellow laugh sounded on the frosty air.

"The parcel," he remarked, as he handed it to her, "is a baby."

"A baby!" repeated Margaret, almost, between astonishment and numbness of her bare fingers, letting the soft, heavy bundle fall. She ran up to the house with it as fast as she could go, while the stranger drew the wagon to the roadside, and led the horses to the barn. When he entered the parlor of the Lanyons' home, he found Margaret warming milk for the fat little lassie who sat contentedly on grannie's lap, while the boy slept soundly on the lounge.

Grannie looked sharply at him over her spectacles.

"Why, you're Mr. Williston's son; if I ain't wrong."

"Yes," he replied. "I am on my way back from England. The carriage was to have met me at Crandon, but failed to do so. The only man I could get to drive me appeared half drunk, so I attempted—foolishly, I admit—to drive the distance home alone. I had no idea, when leaving Crandon, that the night was going to turn out so cold, or I would have remained at the hotel there until to-morrow. We were fortunate, however, in having the accident occur—if occur it must—so near Mr. Lanyon's house. This is Mr. Lanyon's house, is it not?"

"Yes," assented Margaret, "and there is father now."

The old couple, hurrying in, were quite cordial to their unexpected guest, and Mrs. Lanyon bustled around to make the three comfortable for the night. It was with secret interest and sympathy Margaret regarded Palmer Williston. Mention of his name recalled the story her father had told her that day at dinner.

The Willistons were the great people of that part of the country, and owned a beautiful home. Several years ago the only daughter of the house had run away with a French music master. She had been disowned, and her name was not spoken among her relatives.

This fall a letter had come from abroad, stating that she was dying—that her husband was dead. Her brother at once left to bring her back, but when he reached her former residence, he was too late to do aught save bring the children home to their grandparents.

The following morning dawned blue and bright. Philander, who had come from the village with a lengthy string of excuses, repaired the buggy, and drove the guests to their destination.

The acquaintanceship, so singularly begun, did not end there, however. Palmer Williston came over frequently during the holidays to the pleasant old farm-house on the hill. He was a fine, straight, honorable young fellow, and the folks approved of him most heartily.

New Year's came and went. It was time for Margaret to go back to school. It was Palmer Williston who drove her to the depot at Crandon, where she was to take the train.

"Margaret," he said, "I am coming to see you graduate in June. And then I am going to tell you a story."

"That will be very nice," she said, but she would not meet his gaze. "I like stories."

"Do you," forcing her to look at him, "like love-stories, Margaret?"

"If they are well told, yes," and her cheek were rose-red.

"I shall try to tell this one well," he declared, with a happy laugh. "We are almost at the depot, Margaret. Won't you kiss me good-bye?"

She did not resist when he pressed three rapturous kisses on her tempting lips.

In June following he was present at the graduating exercises, and on their way home he told Margaret a delightful love-story, which so pleased her that in September she became Palmer Williston's bride.

He—That gas man is a bird. She—Why do you use such slang? He isn't a bird, for he has neither wings nor feathers. He—No, but he has a bill.

Catarrh
AND COLD IN THE HEAD
relieved instantly by one application of Birney's Catarrh Powder

REV. FATHER CLARKE, Secy to the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Columbus, Ohio, writes:

Gentlemen:—I can say enough for your Powder. It has cured one of my aged clergymen of catarrh from which he could not get rid, and he delighted with it. All my friends to whom I have shared samples are quite enthusiastic over it. The good it does seems almost miraculous. If there are of us in the Essential order that ever—I will do anything in my power to speak a good word for the remedy to help others who are suffering.

M. D. FERRIS, Christian U. S. Algonkin's Horse, Chicago, writes:

Gentlemen:—Every sufferer feels for a brother of pain, and I feel prompted to write from every fiber of my whole I trust, was induced by a friend to try Dr. Birney's Catarrhal Powder for my deafness. Have received no hearing entirely, so that I can now hear a watch tick quite well, and hook if I choose from my ear. I feel I owe it as a grateful duty to my deafness and have recommended it to my friends, and can say I have never heard of a case where it has failed to relieve.

*Boxes north of river.

Fire alarms are sounded upon the lower bell at department headquarters by striking the number of the signal station nearest the fire, in this manner: If for box 4, four distinct strokes and repeated; if for box 12, one stroke, a short pause, then three strokes, and repeated, thus, 1-111, 1-111, etc. "Call" is sounded for all fires within the district bounded by Fifth, Ninth, Jackson and Quincy streets.

TEN STROKES, and repeated, followed by the number of the signal station nearest the fire, is the SECOND ALARM—for a serious fire.

THREE STROKES, followed by TWELVE, and repeated, is the GENERAL ALARM for a very dangerous fire, and calls out the entire department with a detail of police.

TWO STROKES, slowly, indicates FIRE IS OUT.

One long whistle from water works, for fires south of river. Three whistles from same, for fires north of river.

Burns are absolutely painless when De Witt's Witch Hazel Salve is promptly applied. This statement is true. A perfect remedy for skin diseases, chapped hands and lips, and never fails to cure piles. J. K. JONES.
