SCIENCE.

CARBONATE OF SODA.—A new process for producing this important salt has been patented in Great Britain by Mr. Walter Weldon. It consists in placing within a strong vessel equal equivalents of common salt and carbonate of magnesia, with a small quantity of water, and pumping into the vessel carbonic acid, formed by passing atmospheric air over heated coal. The carbonate thus becomes the bicarbonate of magnesia, which dissolves in water and thus decomposes the chloride of sodium. The chlorine unites with magnesium, forming chloride of magnesium, and at the same time bicarbonate of soda is formed and precipitated. The whole process lasts but a quarter of an hour. A moderate heat drives off the second atom of carbonic acid, thus changing the bicarbonate into carbonate of soda. By evaporating the solution of chloride of magnesium to dryness, and raising it nearly to a red heat, the chlorine is driven off and magnesium is formed.

America now imports every year several million dollars worth of carbonate of soda from England, where it is made by the use of common salt, sulphuric acid and chalk, according to the process of Leblanc, invented toward the end of the last century.

CALCUTTA COPAL RESINS.—The Comptes Rendus publishes some new researches by H. Violette on these resins, which previously had been found soluble in ether, turpentine, benzole, petroleum and other hydro carbons, as well as vegetable oils, only after losing about 25 per cent of their weight by distillation. Violette's experiments show that these resins, heated in a closed vessel at a temperature between 350 and 400° C., or 662 and 752° Fahr., acquire, after cooling, without losing any of their weight, the property of dissolving, hot or cold, in the above named liquids, and forming excellent varnishes. He finds also that Copal resin, heated as stated, under pressure, with one third of drying linseed oil and one third of essence of turpentine, gives directly, without loss, a rich, clear limpid varnish of a beautiful slightly lemon color, perfectly adapted for carriages, and for the inside as well as the outside of rooms, where delicate painting is required. Under the double influence of heat and pressure this resin acquires new properties. Manufacturers who would take advantage of this discovery, must bear in mind the retort used will be subject to a pressure of at least 300lbs to the square inch.
