The will of the poet Henrich Heine has just been published. Though a Protestant, he desires to be buried in the Roman Catholic Cemetery of Montmartre, in order that his wife, who is a Roman Catholic, may one day be laid beside him. If the French priests will not permit that, he directs that a small plot of ground should be purchased with the same object. All his little property he leaves to Madame Heine.

The Female Question is making strange progress. In a city so litlelikely to be stirred by sentiment as Lisbon have been published several numbers of a paper called A Voz Feminina, which is written by ladies and devoted to the cause of woman's emancipation. The chief editor is Madame Francisca D'Assis Martinz Wood, the Portuguese wife of an English gentleman. Space is given to fiction, poetry, musical history, and fashions; the latter being described in French.

The Athenæum has a brief criticism of "Miss Ravenel's Conversion," by J. W. De Forest, as follows: "Mr De Forest is a zealous partisan, and speaks his mind very clearly, yet with as much fairness and as little offense to good taste as could be expected. He hates the Southerners, and shows his hatred; we, who stand at a distance, should say that he does not make allowances enough for them personally, forgets, for instance, what he says himself, that no man at it would be better to say race of men who had known the delight of living by the toil of others ever voluntarily gave it up; but he gives them credit for some good, and certainly does not spare the evil and folly of his own people. He writes with uncommon vigor, often making very shrewd remarks on matters social and political. The dialogue, the soldiers' talk especially, is easy and natural; the scenes on battle-fields, and in hospitals, both, we should say, known to him by experience, drawn with a most powerful realism of description. The most prominent character in the tale, one Col. Carter, is presented with considerable skill. He is a sort of Dugald Dalgetty of the nineteenth century, a Virginian gentleman, with all Southern tastes and opinions, but loyal to the Union, not because he loves it, or believes in it particularly, but because he does believe in the regular army, and that was the army of the Union. The author seems to think at the last that he has been too favorable to one who was so little of a patriot, and blackens him accordingly. But we like him better, after all, than the sentimental heroes whom we are told to admire. We can recommend the tale, which it would, we should say, be worth while to publish in England."

The same journal characterizes Mr. Lesley's "Man's Origin and Destiny:" "At the outset, and in spite of the many singularities of style and creed which pervade this volume, let us say that it is the work of a thinker and a student. It possesses also a distinction which is uncommon in mere lectures—viz.: individuality. Its author is not a single repeater of other men's views and discoveries, but he fuses all till they run in his own mold; and those who have gone over the same ground as he has may frequently discern that Mr. Lesley is distinguished by clear observation, considerable penetration, and lively fancy. We seldom receive a transatlantic volume so thoughtful, though so doubtful. Other qualities than these named, and not good ones, may appear to our readers in the course of the remarks which we make and the extracts which we give from a book which certainly claims perusal and invites criticism."

AGRICULTURE. A BOOK FOR EVERY FARMER.

THE ELEMENTS OF AGRICULTURE. BY GEO. E. WARING, JR., Author of Draining for Profit and Draining for Health. Formerly Agricultural Engineer of the Central Park, New-York. Revised Edition.

This book was first published about 15 years ago, and was more largely sold than any book of the same character ever brought out in America.

It has now been carefully revised in the light of the latest discoveries of Agricultural Science, and is cordially recommended to every farmer, young or old, who would understand the simple principles on which his success must depend.

It is written in a style so simple that it will be readily understood by all, and while necessarily referring to, and explaining, the chemical relations between the soil and the plant, there is the greatest possible avoidance of the use of Scientific terms.

In fact it may be regarded as a translation into the simplest English of much that, while it is of the greatest importance to the farmer, has hitherto been so clothed in technical language as to be practically inaccessible to him.]

The chapters on Manures will be accepted by all as a clear statement of the principles which underlie the production and use of the most common fertilizers, and will be found most valuable to the practical farmer.

If a copy of this book could be placed in the hands of every farmer in the land it would add largely to the average crops of the whole country.
