Love's Farewell.

Farewell, farewell, I bid thee go,
My heart to thee is dead;
Love, confidence and hope in thee,
From this poor heart have fled.
Thy image fades as time wears on,
Where light was, darkness reigns;
And as thy hour approach, my blood
Lies curdled in its veins.
Thy spell I've known, and sweet indeed
Has been that chain to bear;
Those golden links to me once seem'd
Of all the world most fair.
But now, alas! my love is dead;
Its chains I no more feel;
I can no longer in my heart;
No shrine I bare which to kneel.
I've bid farewell to love and thee,
I've cast thee from my throne,
While in my heart of hearts for years,
Thou hadst sat and called thee own.
But now this heart which thou did'st love,
As in ry action sway,
Renounces thee it once did own
Its sov'reign to obey.
No more within its inmost cells
Can love respond to thine;
The joy which once thy name did cause,
Can never more be mine.
All feelings now for thee are dead,
All thoughts of me must end;
As strangers we can never be,
But always call me friend.
Think not that I would curse thy name,
No, this could never be;
For in this heart which once did love,
Hate cannot reign for thee.
'Twas rapture sweet in days gone by,
Those days once to me dear,
To hear the music of that name
Falling on my ear.
But now, alas! say farewell,
All hopes and love are dead;
And like the rose, whose petals fall
Upon its mossy bed,
Soon are forgotten in the past—
For other buds will bloom;
Let love and hope like roses die,
And friendship mark their tomb.

A Blunder.

The extraordinary information reaches us from New Orleans, that Maj.-Gen. Sheridan, commanding the military division of the gulf, has been pleased to order that the emigrants, about to start last week for Vera Cruz, Mexico, on the schooner Lida, should not be permitted to leave either for that port or any other in Mexico, and that his provost marshal general further says, that hereafter no emigrants will be permitted to go either to Mexico or Central America. We presume the like interdict will be made to those who wish to go to Brazil.

While the Clarion has ever opposed the too often expressed desire of many southern people to leave the land which the blood of their fathers and brothers has moistened and made sacred, we cannot but earnestly condemn the use of such means to prevent it, and not the less so because we believe that few measures of oppression would conduce more to beget a determination to seek other homes and the protection of other governments.

As Americans and republicans, we have ever held forth to other nations the doctrine, that the right of expatriation is a natural and a self-evident one. Nor has this been seriously questioned, in modern times at least, by the most despotic of civilised countries, except that some of them, which claim the active military service of all their male citizens within a certain age, have insisted that they had a right to prevent such from leaving until they had fulfilled that service, or furnished substitutes.

Does it become us, professing to be the models of republican freedom, to be the most democratic people on earth, and even now on the high road to such a level of equality as has never before been seen since the French revolution in 1789, to insist that those who do not like our form of government, or its peculiar workings under that form shall not be permitted to seek another which pleases them better, be they women or men, old or young, maimed or whole?

It will be no sufficient answer to say that these persons were going to a place under the authority of a ruler whom we regard as a usurper, and whose form and system of government is in antagonism to our own. Just such opinions were long, and possibly are still, entertained of ours, by the long existing dynasties of the old world, who, nevertheless, permit their subjects to come here. Nor can it reasonably be said that going to Vera Cruz or to Cordova would violate neutrality; for neither place affords any opportunity to enter upon the struggling warfare, which, in some degree, prevails on the outskirts of the empire, and is the only war now existing in Mexico.

On the contrary the emigrants whose exit was opposed, were all or nearly all agriculturists, who were on their way to settle upon and till the ground. They were mostly in family groups; women and children largely composing the number; and the appearance and previous habits of the men clearly showed that they were simply peaceful seekers after the fruits of industry.

We cannot but be impressed with the idea that Gen. Sheridan's peculiar impulsiveness, which makes him a very good cavalry officer and an excellent executor of the orders of a well planned campaign, has misled him this time into setting a precedent which would be a most inopportious one for his almost native Ireland, should his example be followed, which we trust it will not be, in Europe.

Deeply interested as we are in the emigration of European colonists into our own country, and satisfied that no very large number of our own citizens will be likely to leave it for Mexico or any other place unless they find that the professions of republicanism are mere varnish to cover up despotic intentions, we cannot but deprecate that the right of expatriation should be disallowed by the authorities of America, whose example will doubtless be eagerly followed by those nations which are more likely to be seriously affected by the spirit of emigration than are the United States of America.

[Mississippi Clarion.

THRILLING ADVENTURE OF A CINCINNATI TRAVELING AGENT AT A COUNTRY HOTEL.—A short time since the traveling agent for a large publishing house in the city had occasion to "put up" at a country hotel, and, as usual with him, examined the lock of his room door before retiring. Finding it satisfactory, he drew out his revolver and his wallet and proceeded to count the money, of which he had a large sum, collected from agents of the house for which he traveled through the country. This interesting process was undergone by the light of a "tallow dip," and occupied half an hour, at the expiration of which time the traveler prepared to go to bed, first by looking under that article of furniture—a habit usually indulged in by sojourners at country taverns, especially when carrying fat purses—and secondly, by untying the strings of his buffalo overshoes. Now it happened that our traveler was one of those practical fellows who try to "kill two birds with one stone," and he tried to nestle his overshoes and look under the bed at the same time. As he did so his eyes encountered the huge proportions of a massive human head and shoulders protruding from a heterogeneous collection of band-boxes and nameless lumber stowed away there, and a cold sweat broke out simultaneously and instantaneously over his body, at the mere thought of being murdered and robbed by such a giant.

Not a moment was to be lost, for he felt that the would-be robber and assassin saw that he was seen. The traveler seized his money and revolver at the same instant, and in a voice, tremulous, we were going to say, with fear, he demanded the villain to come forth. No reply.

Ah! thought the traveler, the rascal is going to shoot me, and quick as lightning he cocked his weapon and banged away at the gigantic head under the bed, and then rushed to the door and called for help.

The report of the pistol already alarmed the house, and the landlord, the occupants of adjoining rooms, and several loungers from the bar-room, rushed toward the scene of excitement. The traveler was thought to be crazy, for there he stood, his eyes starting from their spheres, his hair on end, and his trembling hand grasping the revolver, while his bloodless lips murmured "I've plugged him sure! I've plugged him sure!" He pointed under the bed with his revolver and the landlord catching a glimpse of the situation, stooped down, with the candle, and drew forth a bronze bust of Daniel Webster, with a bullet-hole through the forehead.

The murder was out, and no amount of explanation could save the cruel crowd from laughing at the traveler, nor keep them from calling for numberless drinks at his expense that night.

POWER OF COMMON SENSE.—On Monday we witnessed a singular case of insanity, and the remarkable power that some persons have to control insane persons. As the morning accommodation train from New Haven to this city stopped at Southport, Conn., an insane woman, apparently about 34 years of age, was forcibly brought on board the cars by her friends, to be taken to the Insane Retreat, at Bloomingdale. She was perfectly wild with excitement, and her hands were firmly tied at the wrists to keep her from tearing off her clothes. As she was forced down into her seat, and held there by her attendants, an entire stranger approached, and, addressing a few kind words to her, inquired after her health, asked to see her tongue, felt her pulse, smoothed her forehead gently with his hand, and in a few moments entirely soothed and quieted her. Her illusions was that she had lost her head and feet. The stranger told her that she was partly right and partly wrong in her impressions; that it was true she had temporarily lost her feet, but that her head was all right, as was proved by showing her tongue. He conversed with her nearly all the way to the city; got her finally to admit that her head was all right, and told her that when she got to Twenty-seventh street she would find her feet. On reaching there, the stranger requested that he might take her out of the cars and place her in a carriage. The friends were incredulous, but consented. The stranger then said, "Well, I told you you would find your feet, when you got here, and sure enough you have. Come with me." This was said mildly, but with a firm voice of assurance and authority, and to the astonishment of all present, she got up, followed her stranger friend out of the cars, and allowed him to conduct her to a carriage and place her in it. He then kindly bade her good-by, and disappeared in the crowd, without waiting to receive the shower of thanks from her friends.
