were those who thought so. But they were critics of a temperament which did not note that with Phillips agitation was a principle, and a deliberately chosen method to definite ends. There were still vast questions springing from the same root of selfishness and injustice as the question of slavery. They must force a hearing in the same way. He would not adopt in middle life the career of politics, which he had renounced in youth, however seductive that career might be, whatever its opportunities and rewards, because the purpose had grown with his growth and strengthened with his strength, to form public opinion rather than to represent it, in making or in executing the laws. To form public opinion upon vital public questions by public discussion, but by public discussion absolutely fearless and sincere, and conducted with honest faith in the people to whom the argument was addressed, this was the chosen task of his life; this was the public service which he had long performed, and this he would still perform, and in the familiar way.

His comprehensive philanthropy had made him, even during the anti-slavery contest, the untiring advocate of other great reforms. The perverted presentation of the justice and reason of the political equality of women, at Worcester in 1857, more than any other single impulse, launched that question upon the sea of popular controversy. In the general statement of principle, nothing has been added to that discourse; in vivid and effective eloquence of advocacy it has never been surpassed. All the arguments for independence echoed John Adams in the Continental Congress. All the pleas for applying the American principle of representation to the wives and mothers of American citizens echo the eloquence of Wendell Phillips at Worcester. His, also, was the voice that summoned the temperance voters of the Commonwealth to stand up and be counted; the voice which resolutely and definitely exposed the crime to which the busy American mind and conscience are at last turning, the American crime against the Indians. Through him the sorrow of Crete, the tragedy of Ireland, pleaded with America. In the terrible experience of the early anti-slavery debate, when the church and refined society seemed to be the rampart of slavery, he had learned profound distrust of that conversation of prosperity which chills human sympathy and narrows the conscience. So the vast combinations of capital in these later days, with their immense monopolies and imperial power, seemed to him sure to corrupt the government, and to obstruct and threaten the real welfare of the people. He felt, therefore, that what is called the respectable class is often really, but unconsciously and with a generous purpose, not justly estimating its own tendency, the dangerous class. He was not a party politician; he cared little for parties or for party leaders. But any political party which, in his judgment, represented the dangerous tendency, was a party to be defeated in the interest of the peace and progress of all the people.

TRIUMPHANT OVER ALL REPROACH.

But his judgment, always profoundly sincere, was it not profoundly sometimes mistaken? No nobler friend of freedom and of man than Wendell Phillips ever breathed upon this Continent, and no man's service to freedom surpasses his. But before the war he demanded peaceful disunion—yet it was the Union in arms that saved Liberty. During the war he would have superseded Lincoln—but it was Lincoln who freed the slaves. He pleaded for Ireland, tortured by centuries of misrule, and while every generous heart followed with sympathy the pathos and the power of his appeal, the just mind recoiled from the sharp arraignment of the truest friends in England that Ireland ever had. I know it all; but I know also, and history will remember, that the slave Union which he denounced is dissolved; that it was the heart and conscience of the nation, exalted by his moral appeal of agitation, as well as by the enthusiasm of patriotic war, which held up the hands of Lincoln, and upon which Lincoln leaned in emancipating the slaves; and that only by indignant and aggressive appeals like his has the heart of England ever opened to Irish wrong.

No man, I say, can take a pre-eminent and effective part in contentions that shake nations, or in the discussion of great national policies, of foreign relations, of domestic economy and finance, without keen reproach and fierce misconception. "But death," says Bacon, "brings to good fame." Then, if moral integrity remain unsullied, the purpose pure, blameless the life, and patriotism as shining as the sun, conflicting views and differing counsels disappear, and firmly fixed upon character and actual achievement good fame rests secure. Eighty years ago, in this city, how unsparing was the denunciation of John Adams for betraying and ruining his party, for his dogmatism, his vanity, and ambition, for his exasperating impracticability;—he, the Colossus of the Revolution! And Thomas Jefferson—I may truly say what the historian says of the Saracen mothers and Richard Coeur de Lion, that the mothers of Boston hushed their children with fear of the political devil incarnate of Virginia. But, when the drapery of mourning shrouded the columns and overhung the arches of Faneuil Hall, Daniel Webster did not remember that sometimes John Adams was impudent, and Thomas Jefferson sometimes unwise. He remembered only that John Adams and Thomas Jefferson were two of the greatest of American patriots,—and their fellow-citizens of every party bowed their heads and said amen. I am not here to declare that the judgment of Wendell Phillips was always sound, nor his estimate of men always just, nor his policy always approved by the event. He would have scorned such praise. I am not here to eulogize the mortal, but the immortal. He, too, was a great American patriot; and no American life—no, not one—offers to future generations of his countrymen a more priceless example of inflexible fidelity to conscience and to public duty; and no American more truly than he purged the national name of its shame, and made the American flag the flag of hope for mankind.

AN INSPIRATION GIVEN TO NATIONAL LIFE.

Among her noblest children his native city will cherish him, and gratefully recall the unbending Puritan soul that dwelt in a form so gracious and urbane. The plain house in which he lived—severely plain, because the welfare of the suffering and the slave were preferred to book, and picture, and every fair device of art; the house to which the North Star led the trembling fugitive, and which the unfortunate and the friendless knew—the radiant figure passing swiftly through these streets, plain as the house from which it came, regal with a royalty beyond that of kings—the ceaseless charity untold—the strong sustaining heart of private friendship—the sacred domestic affection that must not here be named—the eloquence which, like the song of Orpheus, will fade from living memory into a doubtful tale—that great scene of his youth in Faneuil Hall—the surrender of ambition—the mighty agitation and the mighty triumph with which his name is forever blended—the consecration of a life hidden with God in sympathy with man—These, all these, will live among your immortal traditions, heroic even in your heroic story. But not yours alone. As years go by, and only the large outlines of lofty American characters and careers remain, the wide republic will confess the benediction of a life like this, and gladly own that it with perfect faith, and hope assured, America would still stand and "bid the distant generations hail." the inspiration of her national life must be the sublime moral courage, the all-embracing humanity, the spotless integrity, the absolutely unselfish devotion of great powers to great public ends, which were the glory of Wendell Phillips.

SELLING A GOAT FOR ANYTHING.

The Morrisania public pound, with its picket fence and round house, basked beneath the sun yesterday morning like a slice of Paradise cut out before the fall. It was the epitome of solitude, for silence hung about it like a New-England tramp. Every now and then a sweet and plaintive cry arose from the quietude, and then a low, rich voice exclaimed: "Shat up." The cry came from a six by nine "billy" goat, and the exclamation was the utterance of the pound-keeper. "Billy" was no goat. He had been there for seven long and dreary days, and had been deprived of his wonted peregrinations about the suburbs, where he had been feasting on "washings" and milk-pails that unsuspecting housekeepers had left out over night. "Billy" had been advertised in The City Record to be sold, and the iron entered deep into the soul of the free-born goat with not a soothing effect, for Billy during his restraint had nibbled the whitewash from the pound pickets and absorbed 150 feet of new hemp rope. Therefore, Charles Rumpf, a genial German, decided that the city would too soon be bankrupt if a diet of hemp rope was necessary for the support of his horned serenity, and when a TRIBUNE reporter asked him yesterday what the upset price would be for the goat, Mr. Rumpf remarked:

"Efrey think."

"Billy" will be sold this morning. He is not the famous "Jesse James" who has been ravaging Morrisania for many days, that worthy having come to an untimely end by reason of the anger of an exasperated housekeeper. "Billy" is a young and not remarkably voracious black goat with white spots. His price will be "anything."

NATIONAL GUARD NOTES.

The visiting company of the 4th Regiment N. J. N. G. won golden opinions from the military men at the 12th Regiment Armory on Thursday evening. Their manual of arms was much superior to what is generally seen. No expense was spared by Captain Aspinwall of the 12th to make the brief stay of the visitors agreeable.

General Ward, at the Court of Inquiry in the 71st Regiment Armory on Thursday evening, called Colonel Vose, who voluntarily attended unrepresented by counsel, and adjourned for one week. It is understood that Captain George A. Miller, of the 22d Regiment has been retained by Colonel Vose to look after the interests of the Regiment.

Major Elliott Roosevelt, of the First Brigade staff, has resigned.

Orders have been issued from the Third Brigade approving of the expulsion from the 17th separate Company, Finshing, of Frederick P. Morris, Thomas F. Graven, D. C. Durling, Harris D. Baker and Charles Marton for the good of the service. A vigorous effort for reinstatement was made by Frederick P. Morris, but without success.

There will be a lawn tennis tournament at the 23d Regiment Armory at 2 p. m. to-day.

The 71st Regiment paraded for battalion drill last night.

CASES AGAINST SHERIFF'S OFFICERS.

District-Attorney Olney said yesterday that the cases of Deputy Sheriff McGonigal and Jacob A. Werthelmer would be pressed for trial, as the evidence was entirely of a different character from that in the case of the Sheriff. The indictment against Warden Bowe was quashed. The charges against Deputy Warden Kiernan seemed to be met by some of the testimony in the Sheriff's case, so that it is probable that no further proceedings will be had against him.
