DUG OUT BY BOYS

They Unearth a Skeleton in a Gravel Pit.

DR. DE CAMP BUYS THE RELICS

And Makes Some Startling Discoveries—The Man Buried With His Shoes on—Further Inquiry to be Made.

The gravel pit on Wallbridge street continues to give up its collection of human bones.

A few days ago Willie and Lewis Morse were playing around the pit when they observed the arm of a human skeleton protruding from the wall of an excavation. They extricated it from the caving gravel piece by piece and succeeded in finding all of the parts which comprise the corporeal frame. The boys gathered the parts into baskets and carried them to their father's house which stands on the hill just south of the pit where they were kept until yesterday. Willie Morse, one of the boys who found the skeleton, a little fellow about twelve years old, walked into Dr. De Camp's office and asked if he wanted to buy a skeleton. The doctor was somewhat surprised at the nature of the business which brought the youthful caller to his office and began to question him about the matter. He explained that he and his brother had found a skeleton a few days since in the Wallbridge street gravel pit and that he would sell it for fifty cents. The doctor did not ask the little fellow to make any reduction on account of dealing with the profession, but told him to bring the skeleton to his office.

He returned in a short time with the bones stacked into a bushel basket and received his money. The doctor then began a thorough inspection of his recent purchase, noting carefully all of the peculiarities and forms of each piece. In speaking of the matter last evening the doctor said that from his observations he would say the skeleton was that of a laboring man of middle age and that the body had not been buried longer than three or four years. His reason for thinking the man had been a laborer was that the right arm was longer and larger than the left, giving evidence that it had been used in muscular work. The skull bones were cleaned and the doctor discovered evidences of a heavy blow having been struck on the top of the head. The temporal bone had also been bruised, and the doctor's theory was that the man had died from a blow inflicted on the head. Among the collection of bones brought in by the boy were found pieces of sole leather supposed to have come from the dead man's shoes. It is thought he was buried without the formalities of a funeral service having been performed and that his brogans were not removed before he was lowered into his gravelly bed. The doctor will continue his investigation and study of the matter.

BURROUGHS WILL APPEAL.

A Police Court Jury Decides Against Him.

C. Sumner Burroughs was found guilty in police court yesterday of attending the play, "Kit, the Arkansaw Traveler" in Redmond's opera house on the Sunday evening, January 10, contrary to the statutes of Michigan.

At the trial yesterday the defense changed its tactics, and instead of trying to show that the play came within the statutes as being morally instructive, it devoted all its efforts to proving that Mr. Burroughs was not there on the Sunday night in question. The first witness called for the people was Police Officer J. B. Johnson. He swore that he went to the theatre before the play began and remained until it was over, that he was sent there by Captain Johnson and paid his way in, that he saw Mr. Burroughs there taking tickets before and after the curtain rose, that he observed him several times during the first two acts, and that he saw him at other times during the performance. On these last points of seeing Mr. Burroughs he swore very positively. He did not know whether the music was sacred music or not. He called the play a comedy-drama, and described parts of it.

Emmet Smith, another officer who was detailed by Captain Johnson to see the play and gather evidence against Mr. Burroughs, swore substantially as did Officer Johnson, except that he could not swear positively to seeing Mr. Burroughs in the theater while the curtain was up, and Attorney Malcolm for the people drew him out more on the point of the moral side of the play. Cross-questioned by the defense, he did not know whether the play had a moral or not, but admitted, in reply to a question, that it had the moral of all such plays, that it is good to do right. The people rested their case with this witness.

Mr. Burroughs himself was the first witness for the defense. He swore that he took tickets at the door until a few minutes before the curtain rose, and then went down stairs to the box office and other places, and did not enter the auditorium again while the curtain was up until near the close of the last act, when he ran up a few minutes to stop some traveling men in one of the boxes from flirting publicly with some girls in the gallery. He said he ordered the orchestra to play sacred music for the overture and interludes. The defense made the strong point in his testimony the fact that the box office was on a different floor from the auditorium, and that Mr. Burroughs being in the box office, he could in no case be attending the play.

John D. McIntyre, dramatic critic of THE HERALD, substantiated Mr. Burroughs's testimony in regard to the latter's not being in actual attendance on the play, and swore that the piece contained much moral instruction. Prof. Fosse, leader of the orchestra, swore that the hallelujah chorus of the Messiah was played for the overture of the piece, "Still Columbia" at the close, and no followed sacred music in the interludes, not incidental to the play. Louis Rathmacher, who acted as treasurer of the opera house on the night in question, corroborated Mr. Burroughs's testimony as to the latter's whereabouts, as did also Dave Sunday Gray, and John Finn of the Morning Press. The jury retired and returned in five minutes with a verdict of guilty. Judge Hoggatt suspended sentence until today, Mr. Burroughs will promptly appeal the case to the circuit court.
