A condensed expression is herewith given of an English writer's views of certain modern elements of British society, set forth at some length in the Pictorial:

What are we coming to?

Traditions, customs and illusions are becoming swept away and innovations of all kinds are being introduced. We are living among a new race toned up to extremely advanced ideas.

The race is, indeed, getting so wise and so experienced and so rational that it seems as if the reformers will soon be left with nothing to do. The general tendency is to become calculating and philosophic.

The young folks do not so readily jump at conclusions, and it is not so easy to deceive the elders as it used to be. There was a time when young folks were foolish and romantic enough to fall in love at "sweet seventeen." Marriage frequently followed with even hurried promptness. But this, fortunately, is one of the doings that has of late years been greatly modified. To be sure, there are many exceptions to this matrimonial reform, but the young people do not now behave in this irrational manner, in the bulk. Here and there unregenerated, heedless, young folks, with more soft heart than sensible head, do this sort of thing. But that eminently practical authority, the registrar-general assures us, that taken in the aggregate, the numbers increase of young men and maidens who defer the wedding day until a later and later date. It seems, if the increase in these "later dates" continues a few more years in like proportion, that about 40 will be considered a nice, sensible age at which to marry!

Now who would have supposed that the once dangerous widow, by whom all the arts of fascination are supposed to have been perfected, and herself exempt, this would have numbered herself among those who, deliberately and long, "look before they leap," and even carefully refrain from increasing marriage certificates! Did not the senior Mr. Weller give the immortal advice to his son to "beware of widders," and has not the fascinating widow been a familiar figure in fiction and in the drama for hundreds of years? But in this matrimonial respect, also, the statistics set forth that the old style is changing to the new. The arithmetical calculators have it that widows do not so much hasten to remarry, and do not by a considerable percentage contract a second marriage as previously.

The modern widow, like the modern mother-in-law, is rapidly losing her "old time" characteristics. The comic papers may continue to indulge in little jokes at her expense, and the fictionist may continue to find her a useful character to keep in stock, but the realities connected with both are radically changed.

The registrar-general tells us that during these later years the remarriage of widows is steadily on the decrease.

To what cause is due this change in the matrimonial conduct of the widow? Can it be that, having become possessed of "advanced ideas," she feels that "single blessedness" is a sort of emancipation? Does this decrease of second marriages imply that it was only "custom" that prompted a previous repetition of conjugal relationship?

Some theorists go far enough to assert that the advance condition of the modern age permits an honest although silent admission that she feels that liberty is sweeter than matrimonial protection coupled with conjugal dictation. These theorists give as a conclusion of their argument that the widow, really preferring her liberty, takes advantage of the modern state of society which recognizes a woman's single independence as a creditable equal of her matrimonial submission.

It follows that the statistics show that young men do not marry at so early an age as formerly, and that each succeeding year counts a larger number of widowers who are contented with "returned bachelor life and its privileges."

From a calm point of view the solution of the whole business is that the heart is subservient to the head in matters pertaining to love.

The serious question now is, "whether or not" the modern generation is the better or happier for this sort of "progressiveness."

TEA GOWN AND OPERA CLOAK.

At the Picture Gallery.

One Way to Widen.

A trick by which to add to the apparent width of chest of an outside garment is to pass a narrow band of fur directly across the front line, letting it curve up the least in the world in front. A curved line is longer than a straight one, and width will be judged by the length of the line between the two points, while the curve is not enough to be noticed. This band of fur continues under the arms, but not across the back. A narrow back and wide chest is made for beauty. Have the back of the garment fitted, now bind in the top part of your sleeve by a band of fur just like that across the front of the garment, and lo, it comes at exactly that place on the arm where it will seem to be really a continuation of the band across the chest, as if, instead of going under the arms, the band went right out over them. Then the eye will judge the width in front by this apparently prolonged line, and so, with safety, you may let the folds of the front sweep straight down the entire width of the chest to the hem. Such a cut implies, for due proportions, a setting out into almost a train in the back, and a close fitting over the hips at the sides. We want looseness in front, but no bagginess anywhere, and the finished garment must not in the remotest way suggest the dreadful Mother Hubbards. The accompanying sketch was drawn from a very handsome jacket in black cloth, shot with peacock blue surah. The collar and bands about the wrists are black Mongolian goat.

New Toilet Effects.

The long shawl has been resuscitated—the scarf in which the beauties of the first empire draped themselves, and called a "pantique."

Not the shawl itself has returned as yet, but the appearance of it, all the suggestion of it, is here in long scarfs of lace or velvet, that encircle the shoulders and hang to the foot of the gown. This event was prophesied last spring. It is the most important fact to chronicle at this moment in the fashion world.

Everybody must have a gown with a "shawl effect" to be up with the times. Steel-blue velvet forms the sleeves and a wide, soft facing the neck of a pretty gown, carrying the eye round with all the effect of a scarf, which is gathered into a knot in front, whence it hangs in long ends to the feet.

PARIS GOWN IN GREEN CLOTH AND BLACK VELVET.

Looking over the opera house on a gala night you will see many gowns similarly made; one of pink with a scarf garniture of blue velvet; another of pale blue with scarf of mauve; still others in which this garniture is of lace. You may see also in a box an ermine cape with these long ends.

In another box may be seen a very elegant gown of ribbed novelty cloth with a shawl garniture of velvet and trimmings of Russian embroidery on velvet. The square revers give the width so much liked to the shoulders, and a wide corselet in the back of embroidered velvet separates in front, one part narrowing down for a belt and the other rising in a band over the bust, where it is held by passing under a buckle. This model is carried out in browns, and would be equally satisfactory in violet, or in steel blue cloth and velvet, and embroidery in beads to match the color. It would also be admirable in black silk and velvet.

Items About Women.

Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson is a portly, gray haired woman, who was a grandmother—and looked it—when she married this second husband. Her son, Lloyd, who collaborated with Stevenson in the ghastly tales, "The Wrong Box" and "The Wrecker," was a middle-aged man before he began to write.

Elaine Goodale Eastman, wife of the native Indian who has recently made trouble at Pine Ridge by his complaints against the government agents, has resigned her membership in the Indian Rights association in a letter in which she protests against "the partisan and unfair action of its corresponding secretary, Herbert Welsh." This gentleman says to a reporter of the Philadelphia Press that his attacks upon the lady consist merely of replies to her printed letters about Captain Brown, the agent.

The duke and duchess of Newcastle will start for Canada and the United States about the middle of April, and subsequently will go to Honolulu. It is probable that they will visit the world's fair.

Mrs. Bellamy Storer of Cincinnati, the owner of the Rookwood potteries, received 100 awards at the Paris exposition. She will have a beautiful exhibit in Chicago.

Queen Victoria has immense wine cellars in her various palaces. Her old port, sherry, East India, Madeira and Cabinet Rhine are said to be the finest in England.
