This department ran across a breezy domestic scene yesterday. It was a repetition of a frequent sort—a genuine gust of temper and a small fusillade of unkind personalities on both sides, with conclusion of Arabella in tears and Algernon in hat and overcoat sulking at the corner drug store.

"You see—it is just this—it won't do to let him begin imposing on me," sobbed Arabella.

To be sure Arabella was wildly weeping, but she was mad clear through. She wasn't in a state of mind to listen to reason.

Neither of them ever is when they are getting back at each other.

Furthermore, all married pairs should have their pow wow out by themselves. It isn't a wise third party who gets into it.

By now Arabella is cooler-headed, and, being good hearted, she will not flare up when this department says a few words aside to her.

Arabella, perhaps you have observed that the woman who is always seeing to it that she isn't imposed upon is seldom otherwise than more or less miserable.

This sort of woman when riding in the street car, or shopping, or sitting in committee meeting, or attending a social affair, or in her own home—always she is suspicious that somebody is somehow crowding her rights and brushing her self respect the wrong way.

Arabella, this kind of self-assertive woman is an unmitigated nuisance. Really, in mercy to human kind, she should be fenced away from everybody. But it's 10 to 1 that she would then peek through the cracks and would single out something as a personal affront to herself.

Naturally this up-in-the-air individual is more or less selfish. It must be so with folks who are everlastingly thinking about themselves.

Now, Arabella, it doesn't pay to be fussy about being imposed upon. The returns are especially poor when a woman is fussed concerning her rights with her husband. She shouldn't lose sight of the fact that he is privileged to have a few of his own.

The American girl is naturally self-reliant. When she becomes a wife it is not unlikely that she may see a small dissatisfaction on the part of her husband as a large wrong against herself.

She promptly puts herself into a fencing attitude "on principle."

That is, she means to make him understand right away quick that she will not be imposed upon.

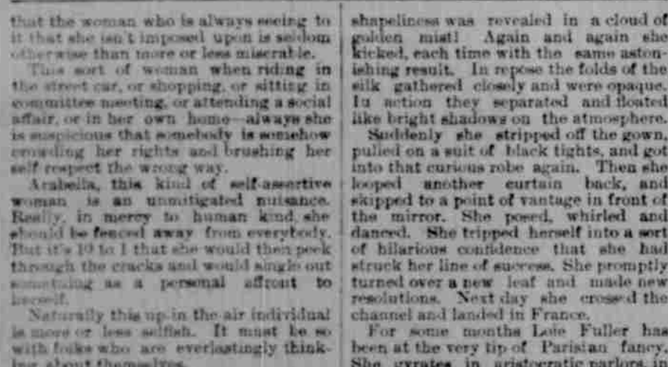
And he—well—if he is much of a man he sets out on the same tack!

That makes bad business, of course.

Arabella, the symptoms were very lively last evening that this is what ails you and Algernon.

Don't forget that matrimony is a co-operative partnership. The obligations and the patience should be equal. But don't fret lest the heavier weight shift on your side.

And remember, Arabella, whenever it happens you regret sharp words that have been spoken—remember only a coward is ashamed to say that she is sorry.



LOVELY NEW STYLES FOR GIRLS.

Her Gown Made Her Fortune.

The average reader remembers that not long ago the English critics and managers would not accept Lois Fuller in emotional drama with any better grace than the East Indians had received her in Shakespeare. That was, neither had any use for her in the roles she had attempted.

The little American comedienne was discouraged.

She was thinking one day that it would have been better had she kept right along talking temperance than to have undertaken theatrical business. While she was thus regretting what was and moaning over what might have been she opened a package that had been sent to her by an officer just home from Calcutta. He had told her that he would send to her a gown of wonderful stuff, made in Parsee. He had made his promise good.

The garment somewhat amazed Lois. It was of diaphanous silken stuff, light as air. The bodice was all right, but the skirt was past her understanding, including as it did at least sixty yards in its full construction. She wondered if the thing could be made over, meantime getting herself into it just to see if it would fit. She stood in front of the mirror, which happened to stand just where the sun slanted in front of it. The gown wasn't becoming. It made her look pudgy.

She gave the billows of filmy stuff a scornful kick—and lo! all her graceful shapeliness was revealed in a cloud of golden mist! Again and again she kicked, each time with the same astonishing result. In repose the folds of the silk gathered closely and were opaque. In action they separated and floated like bright shadows on the atmosphere.

Suddenly she stripped off the gown, pulled on a suit of black tights, and got into that curious robe again. Then she looped another curtain back, and skipped to a point of vantage in front of the mirror. She posed, whirled and danced. She tripped herself into a sort of hilarious confidence that she had struck her line of success. She promptly turned over a new leaf and made new resolutions. Next day she crossed the channel and landed in France.

For some months Lois Fuller has been at the very tip of Parisian fancy. She gyrates in aristocratic parlors, in diplomatic halls, and at the theater. She is the laureled dancer of the hour.

It is said that Yvette Guilbert, Lettie Lind and Amelia Glover disport themselves with broader and higher nimbleness than does this pretty American butterfly. It is further said that Lois's fascination is considerably due to the wonderful, vapory, restless sheen of her Indian gown, the like of which can not be purchased by her rivals.

It is well that the fabric of that wonderful gearing has good wearing qualities. But then, Lois is a Yankee, and though her rivals can not duplicate it quite likely she can originate ways and means of substitution.

Women as Poets.

Miss Willard wants Queen Victoria to make Jean Ingelow poet laureate. Jean Ingelow is unquestionably a poet of fine gifts and just now poets of fine gifts are extremely few in England. If the matter were to be decided solely upon the merits there is no reason why Miss Ingelow should not stand as good a chance as any of the male aspirants for the honor.

But we do not understand that Miss Willard's suggestion is made upon the ground of merit, says the New York World. She wants Jean Ingelow made poet laureate not because she is a poet, but because she is a woman. She thinks women have been slighted and put upon, as it were, in this matter. There never was a female poet laureate in Great Britain, and Miss Willard wants the queen to make one by way of asserting the dignity of womanhood.

The suggestion raises the question, Why has no woman ever held this post? A sufficient answer seems to be that no woman has ever been the foremost English poet of her time, and that is a fact for which nobody in particular seems to be responsible.

It is curious but true that women have never ranked very high as poets. They have never won in that field anything like the place they have made for themselves in other departments of literature. Some of the greatest novels in the world have been the work of women—George Eliot, George Sand, Charlotte Bronte, Mme. D'Arblay, Mrs. Stowe and the rest. The greater part of the clever, womanlike English fiction of our time has been done by women. We have had fine essays from women and fine work of other kinds. But there have been very few women who have taken high rank as poets.

From Sappho to Mrs. Browning is a long stretch of time. Between these two lies the period in which almost all the great poetry and nearly all the great literature in the world was produced, yet there has been no female poet in all that period worthy to rank with either Sappho or Mrs. Browning, while Mrs. Browning's rank has undoubtedly borrowed something from the fact that as a female poet of high quality she stood so nearly alone. Her eminence serves only to emphasize the rarity of great poetic achievement by women.

ONIC STRAW HATS.

It is surprising at first glance that this should be the record of literary history. One would naturally expect the more sensitive and more emotional sex to win its best laurels in verse. But women have done relatively better in other walks of literature and art.—Chicago Post.
