World's Tallest Shaft Nearing Completion in Indianapolis.

HEROIC FIGURES IN BRONZE

The Circle Intended for the Governor's Mansion Becomes the Site of a Great Memorial.

Work is slowly progressing on Indiana's great memorial to the soldiers and sailors of the late war. It stands in the spot hitherto known as "the circle," and is the loftiest and most magnificent monument in the world. It is dedicated to the sons of Indiana who fell on land and sea in the war of the rebellion.

The circle, about three hundred and fifty feet in diameter, was set apart in 1836, while laying out the city as the state capital, for the location of the governor's mansion. It has not been used, however, for this purpose, but was a park until the excavation for the monument began. It was bisected by Meridian street running north and south and by Market street running east and west. The street skirting the park was known as Circle street. It was a terror to strangers, who would often be found walking in a circle, and eagerly appealing to a stranger to show them the way out. But the monument now serves to give bearings to pedestrians who visit the spot. It is by special act of the legislature known as Monument Place. Being no longer the "circle" in common parlance, the people are coming to adopt the Italian word "plaza" as a distinctive and euphonious name. When finished there will be no more attractive public court in the world. Monument Place will not be recognized by persons who formerly knew it as the "Circle." Bowlders have given way to asphalt pavements and sidewalks. Granolith approaches on the north and south sides lead to the wide stairways by which the terrace is reached.

The monument proper is square and rises in symmetrical and shapely lines. Its height from the ground to the tip of the torch in the hand of the crowning figure is two hundred and eighty-four feet. It is the highest point in the city, and is the first object that meets the eye on entering the city. The whole structure is colossal, exceeding any other monument of similar purpose in the world. Its material is Indiana stone, the oolitic which has become famous and is in demand from Washington city to San Francisco. Many of the blocks lying in the base of this monument weighed sixty thousand pounds before they were dressed. The handling and placing of such stones were affairs in themselves of much interest. Mechanical science, however, was all sufficient. For two long and a windlass successfully raised the quarry monsters to their permanent bed in the structure. Not a man was killed or wounded in the construction, which has been under way for five years.

The weight of the monument is almost beyond calculation, and of course required a solid foundation. The excavation was deep enough to get solidity, and in the first year after laying the stone the settling amounted only to the eighth part of an inch, which was evenly distributed. There has been no change since. The shaft, however, has shown that there is plasticity in stone. Though over twelve feet square in its slenderest place, the monument at the capital, which is two hundred and twenty feet from the ground, will bend under a strong wind about eight inches. Now that the colossal bronze crowning figure adds over twenty thousand pounds with its supports and braces and reaches over sixty feet higher, the deviation of the stone, due to elasticity, is no doubt much greater. But the monument is able to withstand the heaviest gale that ever blew in the state. Thus, from her lofty station, the shapely female figure typifying "Indiana" may proudly say: "This rock shall fly from its firm base as soon as I."

The dimensions of the monument produce a harmony of proportion and symmetry, resulting in a charm that permits no safe calculations of size by the average person. Height and breadth are lost to the observer in the overpowering sense of magnificent purity and dignified massiveness. It is especially unsafe to trust a citizen of Indianapolis or the state in matters of dimensions. His pride in this work of art adds another disabling factor in such calculations.

Referring to the plans, it is found that the monument consists of a circular terrace on a plot of ground which, with the approaches and prospective fountains is one hundred and ninety-two feet in diameter. The foundation and terrace occupy one hundred and ten feet of this space. The terrace, of massive masonry, is eleven feet high and supports a massive stone balustrade. Within the terrace are apartments for engines, pumps, elevator machinery and quarters for the custodian. From the center of the terrace arises the square base and pedestal of the monument proper. The pedestal is sixty-eight feet in diameter and fifty-nine feet high being twenty-eight feet in diameter at the top. Thence arises the shaft, the same in shape, to a height of one hundred and forty-nine feet, having a diameter diminishing from twenty-two feet six inches to twelve six inches at the base of the capital. Above this capital which is ornamented with carved stone eagles, six feet high, there arises a lantern or turret of iron beams covered with copper, which is twenty-one feet high and eight feet in diameter.

On this rests the crowning figure, thirty-eight feet in height. Miss Indiana stands higher than the highest point reached by the passenger in the the circuit of the Ferris wheel at Chicago. The platform of the capital is two hundred and twenty feet high. It is reached by a winding stairway within the hollow shaft, leaving, however, a chute for the elevator.

The emblems of war and peace are to be embodied in colossal groups, placed on projections of stone, war on the east side of the pedestal, and peace on the west. The service in the army is represented in the first astragal. It has been modeled and is now soon to be cast. The modeler was Nicholas Geiger, of Berlin. His model depicts a nineteenth century scene of war's carnage. The design is particularly bold and picturesque and in full keeping with the grandeur of the monument. The astragal emblematic of the navy is to be placed at about a quarter the distance of the shaft. It was designed by Brewster, now of Boston, designer of the crowning piece. It represents the prow of the man-of-war Hartford, which was the flagship of Admiral Farragut. It is about half complete in the bronze foundry of Bureau Besthers, Philadelphia. It cost $16,000. The army astragal is to cost $21,000, and will be cast in Germany.

There is still another astragal in bronze, known as the upper, resting just below the capital. It has spaces for dates. The monument commissioners would have placed the years of the civil war in the spaces, except that the war covered five years, 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865. It occurred to them then that it would be fitting to memorialize the years of the civil war by the dates 1861-1865, and the Mexican war by the dates 1846-1848. This caused the outburst of indignation against the commissioners on the part of the Grand Army of the Republic, which prevented the unveiling of the crowning figure as a part of the programme of the recent national encampment held in this city. The programme was made to ignore the monument as much as possible. The opposition blazed fiercely for over a year, but the commission had been sustained by the legislature and the governor. It was esteemed that since the monument was not erected to any one person, private or general, it was to be a tribute to every Indiana soldier, whether he served in the Indiana wars, the wars with England, with Mexico or with the rebellious states. The grand army, however, would not permit a recognition of the Mexican war in this conspicuous way, and finally through Hon. William H. English, who became a member of the commission, has secured an order for the removal of the Mexican dates. The dates 1861 and 1865 are to take the places vacated. The only recognition of the Indiana soldier in wars other than the rebellion is to be found hereafter in inscriptions on the stone tablets, on the north and south sides of the pedestal.

The chief bronzes of course are the side groups. Awards in one competition have been made, but the successful models are not satisfactory. The War group was designed by Adrien Gaudez, of Paris, and the Peace group by Hundrieser, of Berlin. They are to cost about ninety thousand dollars. The principal objection to them is their un-American treatment and inadequate size. The commission has an offer from Frederick MacMonnies, the most noted of American sculptors and the designer of the fountain in the Court of Honor at the world's fair, to design and put in place the two groups for one hundred thousand dollars, they to be finished in four years. It is probable his offer will be accepted. The groups are to contain not less than ten figures, from sixteen to eighteen feet high, and will be the most ambitious piece of bronze ever cast in America.

The crowning figure which is finished and in place holds the American foundry records for size. It is pronounced by critics to be a superb piece of work, and of enduring art fame. The designer, Mr. George T. Brewster, modeled it from two Cleveland women, one of whom posed for the body above the waist and the other for that below. The bronze weighs about twenty thousand pounds. It was cast in the American bronze foundry at Chicago. It stands thirty-eight feet high from the base of the globe to the tip of the torch. Its pose represents Liberty exultant. Being unique among statues as to height, there was always a question whether after it was put in its place 250 feet above ground it would be free from art defects. The designer was successful in his conception. The figure harmonizes perfectly with the requirements of art at its great height. It has a simplicity and harmony of outline, free from petty and superfluous details, and has grace of movement combined with vigor and strength. It is free from conventionalities and is original as well as American in treatment. It shows evidence of thorough technical training. The headpiece is an American eagle with outstretched wings.
