IN MEMORIAM.

On that memorable Christmas eve, when all the land was life and gladness, the hearts of the members of one household were stricken down with unspeakable sorrow. Death crossed the threshold and stood with unwelcome mastery over a myrtle wreath ready to wave the chaste of life at God's command. Near the midnight hour the summons came and death took the sweet spirit of Miss KATE WARD on its snowy wings to realms unknown to mortal man. Often before, it touched loved ones with its icy arms but never did it so take one so fair for some unknown cause it spread its plumes and soar away into the wider sky. Oh! death, thou hast torn from loved one's arms a treasure this earth can never replace. Often will loved ones footsteps pass her grave, unconscious of the loveliness that lies beneath. Others may come and go but none can fill this aching void. Yes, spring will come and warblers will clothe each tree and vine; summer will come with its flowers bright and gay; autumn will come with its brown and yellow leaf; the winter with its hoarfrost and bended form, at our door. Kate will return no more, and her bright winged spirit will know of no parting. It will blossom eternally in that sweet "love and love." In her we found an exemplary wife, a devoted mother, a faithful daughter, a loving sister and true to her friends.

But few possessed such virtues, consequently friends deprived of the solemn pleasure of being one of the last to perform that task of love to the last resting place, I here extend my heart felt sympathy to the bereaved ones. Would that I could point some balm in their bleeding hearts. There is balm distilled from heaven and Oh! may its gentle soothing influence attract itself into each of their hearts. She is not dead but sleepeth—"and last put yonder here."

Let us be patient, there is no affliction Not from the ground arises, But affliction sent by heaven, Assume their deep disguises.
