Impositions! Cautions!

TO THE PUBLIC.

In the year 1818 I fortunately succeeded in making a discovery in the manufacture of gin, by which it was deprived of all acrid and inflaming properties, and rendered perfectly pure.

This article was introduced to the public under the title of "Wolfe's Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps."

My manufactory for this article is at Schiedam, in Holland, and no individual, save myself, has imported, or can import a solitary bottle of this pure alcoholic preparation.

The reputation which it rapidly acquired, as one of the most powerful curatives in disease, and as a wholesome, invigorating and pleasing beverage, is without a parallel in the history of importations. Many thousand of our most enlightened physicians, after full trial, have borne testimony to its medical properties in the cure of many distressing maladies. Analytical chemists, over their own signatures, have certified to its purity, and our citizens, in every section of the Union have attested that, as a beverage, it is free from all those impurities and adulterations which, in the spirituous compounds of the day, form a basis for intemperance, and which are sold under the names of brandy, rum, gin, and their relatives.

The well earned celebrity of the "schnapps" soon excited the avarice of speculation, and my genuine article had scarcely received the impress of universal public approbation when a host of imposters, imitators, and importers of a spurious article from other parts of Europe than Holland entered the lists for competition, determined, if possible, to thrust their base imitations into the market under the title of pure gin. There are certain national peculiarities in manufacture which distinguish that of one country from another by superior excellence, totally beyond the reach of any imitation. England has long been famed for her porter, which art in other countries has never equalled. Scotland and Ireland for their whiskey; France for her unequalled brands of brandy, and Holland for her gin.

The imitations of gin in other parts of Europe, have been as far inferior to that of Holland, and especially of Schiedam, in that kingdom, as the common root beer in our city is inferior to the double brown stout of Great Britain.

The moral consequences arising from the administration of a pure article are not the least among its benefits; in Holland and Germany, where pure Hollands gin is a common beverage, drunkenness is rarely if ever, seen; the same remarks apply to the tonics of France. Notwithstanding the French mechanics and peasants drink Bordeaux wine as we do water at their "table d'hoes," intoxication can scarcely be found among them.

In England, where, as in our own country, the basest adulterations are made in spirituous liquors, particularly in those sold in the "gin palaces," under various names, intemperance in all its loathsomeness and deformity has scarcely a parallel.

It is not the genuine article, but the base, spurious adulteration, which inflames the stomach, excites the brain, deprives its victim of his reason, destroys his constitution and hurries him to the tomb.

These adulterated compositions manufactured in and imported from Europe, have, unfortunately, since the introduction of my Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps, found their way here in overwhelming abundance; their importers and retailers have palmed them upon the public as equal in medicinal properties to my article. Medical testimony, having no legitimate claim to that title, has been trumped up to encrap the unwary and credulous; and the degrading imposition has, sometimes, unfortunately succeeded, to the injury and destruction of health, and the increase rather than the alleviation of the disease.

The effects of the "Schnapps" are the tests of its purity. Indiciously taken as a general beverage, it will not intoxicate. Its stimulation is gentle, and unattended with those burnings and cravings of the stomach, which in no exhibition of impure spirits, constantly demand a fresh supply, and which no repetition within the limits of intoxication can satiate.

I have no disposition to urge anything in opposition to the "Made law;" in substituting the use of the "Aromatic Schiedam Schnapps," for the inflammatory compound, under the name of alcohol, sold in the low groggeries of our city, would do much to insure the moral effects which that law is intended to produce; intoxication would be greatly diminished.

Notwithstanding I have surrounded my preparation with every safeguard which prudence could suggest, I still receive daily communications informing me of base imitations under its name, of my bottles being filled with the most impure gin, corked up, sealed and sold as the "Schiedam Aromatic Schnapps." I have endeavored, still further, to guard the public from these impositions and maintain the reputation of my importation; should they still be evaded, I trust the sufferers, wherever they may be, will give me the most early information, when, in their behalf equally with my own, I shall appeal to the laws of the country to protect them and myself.

NED BUNTLINE'S OWN.—NOW READY, No. 3 OF the new series of Ned Buntline's Own, full of characteristic reading. Sold by all newsvenders. A great number.

PUBLISHED THIS DAY—A GLANCE AT THE NAVAL "Star Chamber" or Reform Board, comprising a model Naval Regimen and Pay Table. By a late lieutenant. Price 25 cents. Extract from the preface:—"The 'Council of Ten,' of Venice, that infamous oligarchy, kept no record of its proceedings. The informer, the accusation, the proof, were strictly concealed in the bosom of the Inquisition, and no official declaration of motives, causes or reasons satisfied an anxious and alarmed public of the grounds of punishment or execution. The sudden disappearance of the proscribed victim, his quiet dropping beneath the silent waters of the Lagune, were all that indicated a trial, a conviction, or the sanguinary perpetration of the despotic sentence. Is there not a similarity so startling as inevitably to suggest the idea, that the 'Council of Ten' presented the worthy model after which the proceedings of our 'Board of Fifteen' were skillfully moulded." Every officer of the navy, every friend to justice, every enemy to "Star Chambers," every enemy to "Inquisitions," every friend of his country, should read this pamphlet. Published by STRINGER & TOWNSEND, 225 Broadway.
