McCLELLAN ON THE PENINSULA.

in writing; but they are in the ordinary business line of army movements, the results of which will be seen in a few days. Everything looks towards an advance. Things that are needed are forthcoming, and if the loyal States will do their duty in response to the last call for men all will go well and quickly. Stop croaking, go to work, put down alarmists, drive abolitionists overboard, support McClellan, and times will be as of old, and desponding faces will wear a cheerful aspect. Then Richmond will be ours, and this fearful warfare will be ended.

Battle of White Oak Creek.

LETTER FROM AN ARTILLERY CAPTAIN—RUNNING A TRAIN OF CARS INTO THE CHICKAHOMINY.

HEADQUARTERS, LIGHT BATTERY H, FIRST PENNSYLVANIA ARTILLERY, NEAR FORT DARLING, July 1, 1862.

We have had a victory. Five thousand rebel prisoners and thirty pieces of artillery. In the morning everything indicated a hard fought field and a retreat before dark, as some of the troops had already begun to fall back towards the James river.

Orders were given to push all the wagons under cover at a certain place, simultaneously with the commencement of the action. So the struggle began in right good earnest on the right, and then shifted to the left. Secesh appeared to have it all his own way till the proper time came, and then, to his surprise, he was marched back again, without orders from his superior officers, as if it was understood that they had gone far enough with the joke.

McClellan was there in person, and attended to their case himself. Our army would not budge an inch for them. The enemy could not understand this sort of retreating—counter marching back again, the right falls back and then marches to the left. Secesh sees this and is ex fited. He takes another swig at his canteen of whiskey—a thing they are all well braced with, for canteens of whiskey are found on all the killed and wounded—tightens the straps around his legs—for he has to be strapped lest he fall out of the saddle—and rushes forward on our lines head foremost, only to be mowed down by our left wing, that had marched to the place of the right.

Of course Jeff. did not see this. He thinks he is following our retreating troops; but he finds his drunken army pitching on to advancing bayonets. They cannot stop; onward they fling, like madmen, and, once broken, they cannot be rallied. Secesh has found that McClellan has retreated far enough.

The action was a magnificent one. When the rebel lines had been completely broken and filled up by Smith, Gorney (sic), McCall, Sumner, and Meagher with his Irish bayonets, the gunboats pitched into Fort Darling, and in about twenty minutes blew up the magazine of the fort. It was a grand spectacle. Then, turning on the flying foe, they hammered them back towards Richmond.

For a long time we were drawn up on a large plain, covered with wheat ready for cutting, three miles each way. You could scarcely see a horse standing in it. In there were a hundred pieces of artillery and many regiments of cavalry, ready to pitch in and spill the rebel canteens.

But we were not wanted; so we had to stand there and listen. Everything was cast off and ready for action, with our guns shotted. But our troops held their own and won, and the charges were withdrawn from the guns.

Night came, and we lay down on our guns in the wheat. This morning, though

The dew on our mantles hung heavy and chill;
we rose gally to our posts, ready to go forward, as I understand the order.

Poor Easton was shot through the heart in Friday's fight. His cannoniers stuck to their guns till the rebel cavalry actually knocked the ammunition they were putting into them out of their hands. They took his battery and cried out to him to "surrender." "Never!" was the reply, and in an instant he was knocked out of his saddle with a shower of bullets.

Lieutenant Monk, of McCarty's battery, and Dougherty, of Hood's, in Sunday's skirmish or fight, gave the enemy's cavalry a lesson in dismounting on the charge, unhandling some two hundred of them. Many of them were strapped to their horses, and of course were dragged or fell with them. Altogether it was a lively time for these batteries.

We were stationed on Friday, Saturday and Sunday guarding the railroad bridge. It was a laborious duty, Mr. Fagan, with two of my guns, I posted at Bottom's bridge. In due time the bridge was burned, and when the final order came to return, the train, which was composed of many cars and a locomotive, was fired and run into the river, as it contained a great deal of ammunition. It blew up, throwing fragments of the cars and locomotive thousands of feet into the sky. It was one of the grandest spectacles I may ever witness. We were within about fifteen hundred yards of it at the time. It must have astonished the secesh, who were constantly hovering around the bridge, with about 5,000 troops and some artillery.

On Saturday they made a demonstration with their guns upon Mr Fagan's section at Bottom's bridge. I heard the firing and knew where they were. So, after Fagan gave them a few platoons, I opened, along with a brass piece of Mr. Wilke's, from the railroad track, silencing them in five rounds.

They were completely scared. Every shot told, and, coming from a point they had not reckoned on, compelled them to respect Mr. Fagan's position and withdraw. It was inferred that this party had run out of whiskey; or they "dried up" very soon.

When the train was blown up our artillery ceased firing, and was then ordered to James river to remain the corps. There is every reasonable appearance of a victorious entrance into Richmond soon.

JAMES BRADY,
Captain First Pennsylvania Artillery.

The Rebel Forces Near Richmond.

The forces of the rebels in the vicinity of Richmond have frequently been stated at 200,000. Though this name from various sources, the information seemed to be discredited by members of Congress and even many of our generals. Few of these men believed that they could muster over one-half this number, and argued that they could not supply 150,000 men with the means of transportation at their disposal. As for 200,000 rebels being concentrated in the enemy's camp near Richmond, the idea was generally pooh-poohed. It is to be presumed, from the cautious manner in which Gen. McClellan advanced toward Richmond, that he was one of the few who were aware of the full strength of the rebels, among all those who should have been aware of their numerical strength. The light of truth has penetrated the minds of these infidels at last, however, when it is too late. Now they are convinced, perhaps, that a reinforcement to McClellan's army would not have been altogether so unnecessary as they pretended to believe.

A few facts in reference to the strength of the rebel forces previous to the recent series of battles will not perhaps be out of place. The rebel prisoners taken in these battles assured us that there were 200,000 troops in the army of the rebels around Richmond, and they all felt confident that the place could not be taken by any force less than 300,000 men. The armies of Beauregard, Jackson and Huger were concentrated there and added to that of Johnston. Strange to say, nearly all the rebel prisoners who conversed on the subject admitted these facts, and some of them went even so far as to say that there were 50,000 men more within supporting distance, who could be called upon if necessary. Again, when our correspondent in the Shenandoah valley was a prisoner among the rebels, their officers assured him that 200,000 men would oppose McClellan at Richmond, and that the force he had could never take the city, so well did they know our relative strength. They boasted, likewise, of having over 200 guns, of which 100 were fine pieces of the best description and newest pattern. Not only did these facts contribute to the physical strength of the rebels, but the knowledge of them contributed largely towards giving them confidence to whip us, which is half the battle in a hard fought campaign.

The fact that the rebels were bountifully supplied with whiskey has been noticed already. At such a time rations of whiskey were by no means out of place among soldiers. What was the case in our army in this regard. Our surgeons had ordered rations of whiskey, which were served to the troops till within a day or two of the commencement of the heavy fighting. Their withdrawal at such a juncture is pronounced throughout the army to have been a great lack of judgment. The rebels used their whiskey to such excess, however, and it was of so miserable a quality, that it must sell against their constitutions sorely in the progress of the campaign. Our correspondent observed that the rebels on the peninsula are much better equipped than those in the valley of Virginia were, and from their appearance they were much better provided in other respects.

These are a few notes and observations of the war which may not be without interest.

NEWS FROM RICHMOND.

Important Statement of a Refugee—The Rebel Force in Virginia Estimated to be 250,000 Strong—Stonewall Jackson Not Dead—Jeff. Davis Visits Raleigh to See His Family, &c., &c.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1862.

Dr. D. G. Oliver, formerly of Grant county, Wis., recently of Holly Springs, Miss., who was impressed into the rebel service at the beginning of the war, and since the battle of Bull Run has been acting as Assistant Surgeon in the rebel army, reached here to-day. He had persistently refused to take the oath of allegiance to the rebel government, but was compelled to do so on Tuesday last. He was detailed in charge of twenty-five ambulances filled with wounded to go to Lynchburg. Being possessed of the countersign, he determined to take advantage of the existing confusion to get away. He bribed a negro in Richmond to swap clothes with him, and after passing the pickets, by means of the countersign, he tramped to Fredericksburg and got into the lines of the Union army at that point. He has had a good opportunity to observe the condition of affairs in Richmond. He states that the entire white male population of the South, between the ages of fifteen and forty, have been forced into the army. The conscription there is a reality. Numbers who are in arms are doing duty unwillingly, and would gladly get away from the tyranny of the Davis autocracy. Dr. Oliver has been in Richmond for the last two months. The rebel force in Virginia is estimated at fully two hundred and fifty thousand. They admit a loss of twenty-five thousand in the recent battles. They are subsisting on what is termed half rations, by which is meant only the substantials, without any of the small stores. They have an abundance of bacon, rice and corn, but no salt nor coffee, nor other small stores that go to make up a soldier's rations. Since the occupation of the Mississippi by the federal forces, cutting off communication with Texas, their supplies of beef are brought from Florida, where there is an abundance of wild cattle. The stock of whiskey is pretty well exhausted. Dr. Oliver says the greatest depression he observed was produced by the intelligence that President Lincoln had called out three hundred thousand additional troops. The opinion prevailed that if these troops should be promptly furnished the rebel game would be ended. They have exhausted their resources for soldiers, and would be unable to contend against a fresh army of that size. Their only hope is that this call will not be promptly responded to by volunteers, but that there will be sufficient delay to afford an opportunity for foreign intervention before they are forced to give up. Dr. Oliver says the rebel plan of fighting is not with reserves, but by retreats in the field, and that in every battle, regiments are regularly relieved by fresh troops, after having fought for a little while. In this way it was hoped to wear out and tire down the troops under McClellan. It is seldom that the same regiments have been allowed to engage twice in the same battle. The rebels have concentrated nearly all their available troops at Richmond, except so much of Beauregard's army as stopped at Charleston, and about thirty-five thousand of the same army left in Mississippi. The rebels are terribly afraid of the gunboats. They reckon one gunboat equal to a whole division on land. They admit that the recent movement of General McClellan was a masterly stroke of policy, and that his present position is infinitely stronger than the one he abandoned. It is his impression that no further attack will be made upon him where he is. The rebels are sending their wounded and prisoners to the interior. There is no room for them in Richmond, and medical stores are exceedingly scarce. Dr. Oliver was obliged to dress wounds and amputations with only cold water and bandages.

The reported death of Stonewall Jackson is untrue. Dr. Oliver saw him alive and well in Richmond on Tuesday night. Jeff. Davis went to Raleigh to see his family.

Rebel Account of the Battles.

MEMPHIS, July 5, 1862.

Richmond despatches to July 1 and 2 still claim that the rebels captured eight generals, 12,000 prisoners, all of McClellan's siege guns, and supplies enough for the rebel army for three months. They represent the battle of July 1 as the most fearful and desperate of the entire war.

The latest despatch states that there were conflicting reports about the battles, and it was impossible to get official information. The precise situation of the Yankee army is not known.

Prisoners were arriving in Richmond all day on the 2d. It is claimed that Hooker and Sumner were wounded, and that Sumner was captured! The latest reports were less exultant.
