Where the Beautiful Rivers Flow.

[illegible]

—Father Ryan.

European Correspondence—No. 17.

During the service which took place at St. Roch Church, one of the splendid processions took place. It seemed a miracle that room could be made for it to move through the aisles where every inch of standing room seemed already filled with spectators. I could hardly call them worshippers that day; in the lonely aisles on quiet days one sees the true devotions of the poor and lowly who come to pour before the Cross, or at the feet of some favorite Saint.

In the afternoon we went to the cemetery of Pere la Chaise. This, even this sacred ground, was another place dressed by the Communists, and only saved by a force control. Our custom of All Souls' corresponds to the Decoration Day of the United States. The thousands of thousands of thousands who crowded into the cemeteries went there for the purpose of renewing the flowers and other decorations of their graves. Natural flowers are scarce in Paris, and the tokens of affection consisted in the wreathes of tinsel and immortelle, and bouquets of artificial flowers. I never saw such a crowd out of doors as that which surrounded the approaches to Pere la Chaise. Entrance was granted by one gate, and the police and soldiers had hard work to enforce the regulations and keep the exit at the other gate. The streets were jammed for a whole block outside both, and I do not know how it looked at the carriage entrance beyond. Once inside, the people wandered in different ways, and were to be seen in groups busy over the graves, or in the little shrines erected in the centre of a great many lots, pulling away the last year's wreaths and placing the new. We saw the tombs of many famous men, and we went to a spot none have visited who go to Pere la Chaise—the grave of Abelard and Heloise. It is a chaste and beautiful work of art, and a touching token of the way the French people honor their famous dead, even when friends forsake them.

Paris is famous for its clean streets. I was not surprised at hearing some one, just landing in New York from a European steamer, remark: "You do not keep very clean streets here." I was glad I was not the native-born New Yorker to whom the remark was addressed.

The boulevards Parisian streets are called boulevards. They are broad, well paved, and shaded by trees. They are washed every day, more regularly even than the careful merchant sprinkles his dusty shop floor. A plentiful supply of water is turned on by means of hose, and when the broom has been applied and the dirt taken away, you may see the water running over the street and into the gutters as clear as it comes out of the hose. When that condition of cleanliness is reached, the washerman or woman throws on. Twice, during my three weeks in Paris, I saw rubbish in the street—once it was a piece of wrapping paper; the second time a bit of dress-braid three or four inches long, evidently just torn off from some lady's skirt. The incident was so surprising that it attracted notice each time. The length of the sewerage, which carries away all the rubbish of the streets and residences not adjacent and utilized, is over 300 miles. It was formerly quite common for strangers to visit the large sewers, which may be called upon in a boat or wear prepared for that especial use; or one can walk by the side of the sewer, as on the towpath of a canal, or by the side of a railway in a tunnel. Now, there is an admittance for strangers only twice a year, and there is a good deal of formality about getting a permit. It is a curious voyage this, in company with the inspectors and workmen and a few visitors. The dim tunnels are lighted only sufficiently to make the darkness visible. Every moment one is expecting some grim object to turn up floating along in the current, and at every turn one wonders, "Where next, and how many more miles?" and all the time feels an agreeable disappointment in observing no unpleasant odour. This is owing, doubtless, to the quantity and current of the water. Several streams, which would, on the surface, have run through the city and emptied into the Seine, are utilized by having pipes entire into the sewers. The dyers' stream is one of these. It comes in after serving its purpose at the Gobelin tapestry works, and elsewhere above ground. After some hours of this sojourning, the traveler is willing enough to make exit by means of a stairway leading to some one of the openings miles away from the entrance in the Place de Chatelet. His first impulse may be to spend the rest of the afternoon out among the trees and flowers of the Bois de Boulogne—a grove in the neighborhood of the city. He signals a passing omnibus, whose driver goes nicely on, and makes no sign. You may hail several more with the same success, perhaps, unless you know the Paris regulations. These oblige a conductor to put out a board marked "complete" as soon as all the seats in his "bus are taken—fourteen inside and twelve or fourteen outside—and he is to allow no one else to enter as long as the seats are occupied. If you despair of getting a place, since it is an hour when many are riding, you have only to walk on a short distance to an office of the Omnibus Company, and tell the agent behind the desk which route you wish to go. He gives you a ticket—No. 30, perhaps, and your companion No. 31.

After sitting a moment or two on one of the stuffed benches provided for waiting passengers, or amusing yourself with examining the guide books displayed for sale behind the desk, your 'bus comes along and lets out some passengers who are either leaving or changing routes by means of a "correspondance." You hasten to the 'bus to company with several others who were at the bureau before you, and whose numbers therefore come first. It would seem that the last one the conductor admitted by ticket was 25, for now, standing on the steps of the 'bus, he calls from the list in his hand, "26, 27, 28, 29,—complete." Only four people got out, and only four can get in. Off they go, leaving you and No. 32, who rushed up breathless at the last instant, to wait once more. But you are sure of getting in next, as 29 has a seat, and you are 30. In five minutes you are provided for, and, as you hand your ticket and fare on entering, you ask for a "correspondance" for the Bois de Boulogne route. The conductor gives you a check which entitles you to a passage in another line without further charge. Your correspondence is not a numbered ticket like the one you just handed in, securing a seat; and you are liable to another delay at the bureau when you are to make your change. Arriving there you dash in, having learned wisdom by experience, and secure a ticket instantly. This time it is 96, and, fortunately, is among the first called, and now you feel well on your way for the garden. Admirable and comfortable as the 'bus arrangements are, they may yet bring you to grief—this very evening, perhaps, when you wish to return from the grove, the three or four miles to your hotel. You come to the bureau at half-past five, and find a throng before you, to begin with. Then, to complicate matters, every 'bus comes by "complete," and drops no one to make room for more. You amuse yourself for a time with the chatter of the people about you, ladies gesticulating, expostulating, teasing the officials to change their tickets for a lower number and at earlier chance, officers bland yet firm. But presently you grow tired, anxious, hungry, disgusted, and at the end of three quarters of an hour you return your ticket at the office and start home on foot, congratulating yourself, as every 'bus passes by full, that you walked no longer.

Or it may be that you intend to spend the evening. No. 30 gives you the last seat, and 31, who must go with you to see you home, is left out. Vain are your struggles to get out and wait too, and your remonstrances, "Mais mon frere, mon frere!" you are held back, and scolded and frightened out of your wits till you are finally given to understand that since you are once seated you cannot leave without paying your fare. Your number was checked as it was read off on your entrance—there it stands "30," equivalent to a six cents fare to be accounted for by the conductor at the next station, and to come out of his pocket if it does not out of yours. So you pay your fare and get out, or more likely you pay your fare and stay in, and 31 comes on after you a trip or two later, and finds you waiting at the Porte Maillot, the first entrance to the Bois de Boulogne.

Here we will remain waiting, admiring the Arc-de-Triomphe de l'Etoile which stands near us, till some other time when the "he" and the "you" and the "we" that are mixed up in this document can get together and find out what is within the gate.
