A Poem for New Year's Eve.

[illegible]

Miscellaneous.

George Macdonald has been giving in England representations of his dramatic version of Pilgrim's Progress. The whole of the frame and other accessories are homeomic. The only player the part of "Prudence," and herself dual of "Greatheart," his sons are doubtless taking the other parts. The scenes are the interior of Christiana's House, the Wicket Gate, the land called Beautiful, the Valley of Humiliation, and the land of Beulah.

A Western paper thinks Henry Stanley was unpopular in Spain when he performed the marriage service for Prof. Tyndall. Instead of the usual formula he should have said, "Do you take this authority to be your comfortable, to love with your whole soul, to cherish, with your whole collection, until a first molecular disturbance shall resolve its component into its primitive elements?"

A Western paper brought his little girl to the Highlands of the Hudson, where, for the first time in her life, she saw mountains. They were sitting on the piazza of the West Point Hotel, looking on the finest scenery, and near view that he is to be seen east of the Rocky Mountains, and the little girl had been sitting silently, with her hat in hand, for some minutes—looking now at the mountains, now at the clouds—when, with a certain inspiration, she waved her hat above her head, and cried, "Hurrah for God!" It was an act of genuine worship; it was a prayer to David's call on every soul to praise the Lord.

Immortal Love or Flowers.—Col. Grant's "Progress" says of flowers in Philadelphia: "A love of flowers is spread throughout the whole community with astonishing rapidity, and the evidences of this new fondness are seen on every hand. The windows of the houses of the poorer classes are blooming like bowers, the baskets of flowers are offered for sale on the sidewalks, while gentlemen and ladies were equally ready to follow the gaudy badge of affiliating the fashionable bouquet in their dress. Perhaps one of the happiest results of this popular fancy is seen in the window gardens. Along the crowded and the neglected lines of our great shipping marts, where every inch of room is valued for the capacity of display, and where the masts and rigging of ships seem shutting out the sky, we now see in increasing groups of flowers and clusters of vines decorating the narrow spaces over the windows and awnings, and giving a sense of the freshness of growing verdure into the regions of the dry-goods merchant. The old desert of the hotel door now, too, is beginning to grow beauty, and porches and window are adorned with graceful vines. This instinct for flowers is partly due to a fault of fashion, but it may also be regarded as a movement of individual enlightenment in matters of taste. A heavy rumbling, rather dull than dignified, has too long governed the decorations of our houses, and an ever-increasing diffusion of artistic culture must necessarily spread among the rich as it becomes generally recognized that reality of effect can be accepted instead of expensiveness of material, and that inventive talent and artistic taste find one of their noblest fields of service in adding to the beauty and comforts of our homes."

Tennyson Figurines. (Houghton, Osgood & Co.) Whatever may be the author of this handsome monograph he is certainly master of a graceful style, and brings to the treatment of his subject a zeal born of the pursuit of a comparatively new line of artistic study. The literature contains but few works of reference on the subject, because no one has had sensibility to write it up, although the little clay figures from the moulds of Northern Grove have already, on their own peculiar merits, conquered a European fame and secured places in the most renowned public and private collections of the world. Of these the principal are in Paris, Berlin and London, and recently a valuable selection has been secured for the Boston Art Museum by private liberality. Tanagra was the chief city of Boeotia, and although for some forty years clay figures have been found in the tombs of that region, it was not until 1872 that figures were unearthed which possessed the distinctive characteristics of this group. They are to the Greeks of the day in which they were made what Roger's groups are to our American life of the present time. Modeled from finest clay of a quality found, as is surmised, only in the immediate vicinity of the city itself, they are distinguishable from all other work of the same class. They were originally colored, each pottery having apparently some peculiar tint or tints which distinguished its work from that of others. Some difference, too, is traceable to different degrees of heat in the firing process. The figures are found in the tombs which underlie a great part of the region round about. Why they were so placed is as yet undiscovered; perhaps as votive offerings, perhaps merely as decorative ornaments. Whatever their use or object they exist in immense numbers, in varied degrees of preservation, and are being rapidly rescued from their long seclusion and placed among the curiosities of the art world. The volume before us is embellished by a number of heliotypes of the figurines, illustrating their general style and indicating some of their characteristic charm and beauty. It contains a full sketch of what is known concerning this Boeotian city, which was half forgotten when these products of her ancient potteries were discovered. It is, we believe, the most compact monograph on the subject that has as yet appeared from the American press.
