WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1882.

How an Extensive Sugar Estate is Managed in the State of Colima.

GUADALAJARA, MEXICO, Dec., 1881.

The hacienda of San Marcos is situated in the state of Colima, at the foot of the volcano of Colima, and is one of the largest sugar producing establishments in the country. Senor Don Miguel Gomez, the proprietor, has about 10 square leagues of land, which is abundantly watered and planted with cane as far as the eye can reach. The cane, which grows very thick, is planted once in 10 years. After 10 months it is cut, the waste being left on the field to be dried and burnt as a fertilizer. In spring the burnt stumps send out shoots and in the fall the cane is ready for the rollers. The sugar-house, stables and offices are built in the old Spanish style, in the shape of a square, with offices in front, stables at the rear, sugar-house on the left and store-rooms on the right, the inside forming a large well-paved corral for the pack animals. There are no wagon roads in that part of the country on account of the barrancas or canons. All transportation is by pack mules or burros (donkeys).

Senor Gomez runs his sugar-house by water-power, which is brought from the foot of the volcano by an aqueduct of solid stone at the hacienda some 30 feet high. He has power enough to run three wheels of the same dimensions as the one in use, which is an overshot wheel 30 feet in diameter. The wheel and aqueduct were built from material on the match. The sugar-houses comprise some three or four large brick buildings,—the mills, boilers, crystallizer, pottery-works and barrel factory. The cane is cut by the peons with long machetes or swords, brought to the mill on pack-animals and stacked under a shed until wanted for the rollers. The heavy iron rollers are cut by ring wheels, and are only a few feet from the main wheel. The crushed cane comes from the mill perfectly dry and is used as fuel. It is far superior to wood or coal. From the mill a stream of cane juice, enough to fill a three-inch pipe, flows day and night for six months. This stream runs under the floor of the mill into the boilers over a direct fire—enough now Senor Gomez is putting in all modern machinery, including steam boilers and refining works. The juice is soon boiled, passed from one pot to the other, being constantly kept in motion and skimmed by the half-naked peons with long-handled spoons. From the boilers to the crystallizers is the next process. These are underneath in much the dripping, each holding 25 pounds. The sugar soon hardens. The drippings below are distilled and make a fine quality of brandy or aguar (lowrie cover). Aguar dente is a national drink and a strong one. The clay jars are made on the place by the Indians, as also are the barrels for the aguar dente. The iron for the hoops comes from an iron mine now being worked with complete shops at another hacienda, La Providencia, who is is also owned by Senor Gomez. This iron has been pronounced as of very fine quality, and there is an abundance of it. The ore contains 48 per cent of pure iron. Coffee is also one of the products, but only enough is raised for his consumption, some 3,000 pounds a year. Along the lowlands large fields of rice are planted to restore cane fields which become exhausted after 10 years. In this way he keeps his fields in rotation and has a new field of cane every year.

Behind the stables there is quite a high hill of rock, on the top of which Senor Gomez has his private residence, the entire establishment having been built over 100 years ago. A winding stair-way cut in the solid rock ascends to the villa, from the roof of which one of the grandest views imaginable is presented. To the rear, the great volcano of Colima towers to the height of 11,000 feet from its crater, a lofty barren cone, from time to time immense volumes of smoke, forming a column beautifully colored by the sun's rays. To the front you can see for miles light green hill-sides covered with cane contrasted with the dark green of the rice fields with blue mountains in the distance for a back-ground, forming a picture never to be forgotten. Near the great barranca of Beltran commands attention. It is a wonderful chasm, perhaps originally formed by the earth's cooling rapidly and cracking during some past eruption of the volcano. The barranca is about 1,000 feet deep and 300 feet or more wide and extends almost to the Pacific ocean—in fact, a small Yosemite. At the bottom of the barranca the Tuxpan river flows along on its way to the Pacific, bringing down from the volcano above immense bowlders which roll along the bottom, grinding against each other and taking everything in their way, making fording very dangerous and a bridge either than impossible almost an impossibility. The garden of the hacienda is a beautiful place, in which grow without care bananas, oranges, lemons, mangoes, alguacates, mamas, limes and all classes of tropical fruits and flowers. At the lower end of the garden is the nursery for the coffee. Old trees, from which the coffee is never picked, are allowed to grow rank and wild; as soon as the berry gets ripe it falls to the ground and in a short time sends out shoots. These are carefully transplanted to the coffee fields and bear in two years. Senor Gomez shows his taste in the arrangement of the ponds, fountains and baths in the garden, all of which are worked in rock and in some places handsomely carved. On our return from the garden we were invited to breakfast, and found a large, well-filled table served by neat peons. Everything had an air of comfort seldom found on a Mexican hacienda, where the luxuries of an American house are unknown.

Senor Gomez, the owner of this and several other large haciendas, is a handsome man of 35 years. He has a wife and five children, who are now living in Zapotlan, the terminus of the stage line from Guadalajara. San Marcos produces about 2,500,000 pounds of sugar a year. The mills are only run six months in the year, but when they do start they run day and night. About 200,000 pounds of rice are also raised. This rice is primitively pounded out with wooden mallets and not hulled with machinery. It requires 8,000 bushels of corn a year to feed the mules and stock. The corn-fields are on the foot hills of the volcano. There are 700 Indians employed daily at an average of 37½ cents a day. Skilled labor is worth 50 cents. The hacienda supports about 3,000 peons. Of stock Senor Gomez has 4,000 head of beef cattle and several hundred head of saddle stock and pack animals. It costs him $2,000 a week to run his ranch.

We are greatly indebted to Senor Gomez for his attention and kindness, and can truly say he is one of the live business men of Mexico. He takes an active interest in the railroads and general welfare of his country.

M. De Girardin.

M. de Girardin, like all men of action, was a very early riser, and even in the decline of his life has been known to make appointments for 6 and 7 o'clock in the morning. "Paris," he said "belongs to the early riser." He was also very punctual in business matters, and had a holy horror of putting off things. One of his sayings, which sounds something like a contradiction and yet fully describes the man, was "I have always kept a horse and a carriage in Paris. You see, I am not rich enough to go on foot. My time is too precious for that."

Much has been said about M. de Girardin's political principles, but in truth he had few. How often he would say: "I shall always prefer the existing Government, whatever it be, to one that does not exist. For if the existing Government is bad, it can be improved upon, while a thing which exists only in the minds of the would-be revolutionists is above improvement." He expressed this sentiment even during the Commune. No one has professed so much contempt for personal abuse as Girardin.

"Why," he would say, referring to the papers, "it is only natural that they should attack me. Did I not first attack them? But since the day I resolved to leave their insults unanswered, I have been the better for it. Let them dissect me, and they will find that personal abuse has not harmed me in the least. Never answer insults, never, never, believe me." And yet he himself was the first man to act contrary to this advice, as his quarrel with Henri Rochefort and Lalleant plainly shows. The latter Lalleant disgusted him with the Republic, and on one occasion he was heard to exclaim: "It is enough to make one despair of a country where every fool can find seventy others greater than he, not to mention the number of people ready to listen to his babble." However, Girardin, with all his grits was singularly wanting in tact. All he did was for effect; and in truth he can be considered a great comedian. Thus his manner and bearing during the preliminaries of the fatal Armand Carrel duel would have been irreproachable had he not answered his challenger: "Monsieur, a duel between us will be a good bit of luck for me." This duel, by the way, was in his eyes a good ending to a theatrical prologue. It allowed him to decline all subsequent challenges, even when he was later struck in the face by one Bergeron.—Le Figaro.
