THE AUTHOR TO THE PUBLIC.
A fourth picture of Irish character is on my dramatic easel. I know you will award heartily the fullest measure of success it may deserve, but I have another and a higher aim. When I wrote the "Colleen Bawn" I simply desired to make an effective play, but the London and Dublin press pointed out a merit in that work I confess I never contempla ed. They regarded it as the first truthful stage portraiture of Irish life, manner and character, and warmly encouraged me to proceed until I obliterated the gross caricature the public had received from the stage—a caricature that had been mainly instrumental in forming a popular and very false impression of Irish nature. Accepting the mission, I wrote "Arrah-na Pogue," and subsequently the dramatic portrait, "Kerry." Now I offer you my latest effort in the same series, and ere I draw the curtain I beg you all, and my own countrymen in particular, to bring your sympathies along with you. Give me what every man yearns for more than fortune—the conviction that he has done some little good in his time. DION BOUCICAULT.
