MONTEZELLO.

Tune's tide rolls lovely down
Serene and calm the vernal day—
O'er grassy meads the rising sun
Sheds his benignant ray.

On Montezello's clover plains
The day with a silent splendor glesms,
And thousands are in contented strains
Blend with the gush of streams.

With silver wing as we are dashing now the
The murder-lust spirit of war,
There Liberty's hosts, the despotic hordes
Are gathered from afar.

For liberty, for native land,
For home, for kindred, and for life,
Shall a million lofty stand
Foremost amid the strife.

And with them, Gallia's safe hosts
Against their ancient foe—
Defying Austria's healthy hosts,
Fair freedom, thy defend.

The cannon's flash, and forward dash
The warlike hosts, the day
With battle smoke and cannon's flash,
Chasing the lights of day.

On Gallia's pennons triumph shall
The same as ever, in years gone by,
The Empire's glittering star arose
Brightest in Europe's sky.

The field the same—as ever bright
That points to victory and fame;
And hearing triumphant sight,
Stands Montezello's name.

THE SOUTH WIND.

BY ELLIS ANNONETTE.

Softer than down on the robin's breast
In the breeze that fans swept over the willow's crest,
And sought out the groves of this land so blest,
Is daily a while.

Capricious and light, it is breathing along,
Fired sighing a sadness the old trees among,
Then whispering the roses sweet lullaby
Caressingly low.

Soft rattling the lattice, admittance to seek,
Half repentant, half tender, it fans the hot cheek,
Imparting an ecstacy words cannot speak,
So balmy and fresh!

It brings the mild dreams of a cottage by river,
Where sparkling, half-hid, the blue waters lave,
And the white-thrilled moth resplendently pave,
Demonstrated soft roses.

A BOLD STROKE FOR A HUSBAND.

BY CARL CONTAD.

CHAPTER I.

Miss Penelope Penrose sat in her comfortable sitting-room, with her feet upon the fender. Everything about her looked neat and cheerful. In one corner of the room stood a piano, but it was shut, and had been all day—Penelope had no disposition to play. Why should she?—there was no one to play to. If now she had a husband—

It was upon this very point that Miss Penelope was meditating.

The fact was Penelope Penrose wanted but six months of being a married woman, and no one had yet made her a proposal. It was rather singular that it should be so. Penelope was good-looking, had a received a good education, was also skilled in music, had a good temper, and I verily believe would make a husband happy. But such things can't be accounted for. She had seen the most unpromising of her companions, even to ugly little Miss Henderson, with not an accomplishment in the world, and, moreover, her face pitted with the small-pox, married off in quick succession. Penelope she sat, on that cloudy morning in December, a devotee of single blessedness, and likely to remain so.

Who there ever a woman that did not consider a married life preferable to a single one, provided she could secure the right kind of a companion? I believe not.

To revert to Miss Penelope. In addition to her other specified attractions, she owned the neat cottage which she occupied, and a sufficient sum in funds to live upon with comfort and elegance. Surely all the beaux must have been blind.

"Something must be done, and that quickly," said Miss Penelope, as the thought of her approaching thirtieth birth day came with startling force to her mind; "yes, something must be done. But what? That is the question. Such is the state of society that women is hemmed in on all sides. She has not even the privilege of choosing her companion for life, but must wait meekly till some one comes along, and take him or nobody. It's wrong—decidedly wrong."

Miss Penelope was in a suitable frame of mind, at that moment, to become an advocate of woman's rights.

Meanwhile it was growing dark, and Miss Penelope rang the bell.

"Sally," said she to her servant maid, "you may bring in lights and the evening paper."

The handmaiden vanished, and presently the articles desired make their appearance.

"That will do, Sally; you may go," she said. Penelope looked first at the marriages—it was no more than natural—then at the deaths. Finding that none of her acquaintances had committed either one or the other, she turned to the advertisements.

One in particular arrested her attention, and—we will look over her shoulder while she read—

"To HOUSEKEEPERS.—The undersigned is desirous of securing the services of a competent housekeeper, to take charge of an establishment. As he keeps two servants, her chief duty will be to superintend and preside at the table. Early application is desirable.

"GREGORY MCKIM."

"Gregory McKim," soliloquized Miss Penelope. "I remember to have heard of him as a bachelor inheriting a large fortune from his father. I suppose he must be about thirty-five by this time. I wonder whether, supposing I were to apply, just for the joke of the thing, he would give me the situation."

It was a new idea, and the novelty of it struck Penelope so favorably, especially as she had become heartily tired of her present mode of life, that, after a little consideration, she determined to carry out out her plan, and if successful in her application, to retain her situation a month or two.

The next morning very early, Miss Penelope summoned her obedient handmaiden.

"Sally," said she, "I am thinking of going out of town for a month or two, and during the time shall close up the house. If you have friends you should like to visit, you are at liberty to go. Your wages, however, are to be continued as usual, and you will let me know wherever you go, in order that I may call upon you if I should return unexpectedly."

The proposal suited very well with Sally's inclinations, as will readily be believed, and though she was at a loss to conceive what had all at once sent such a home body as her mistress on a traveling expedition, she was well disposed to take advantage of it.

Eleven o'clock found Miss Penelope in the cars, flying with all speed to her destination.

CHAPTER II.

Mr. Gregory McKim was a bachelor of thirty-five, as our readers have already been informed. Inheriting a large fortune, it was a matter of so little wonderment to his numerous friends that he called no one to his side to share it. But Gregory was one of those men who never took the trouble to go after anything. It was within his reach, well and good; otherwise the exertion was too great, and he rested in a heap. He seemed content to live on, as he had ever lived, in single blessedness—quite ignoring the greater blessings of matrimony.

It was after dinner, and, as was his wont, he was lounging back in his rocking chair, plunging into the peculiar dreaminess superinduced by a choice Havana cigar, when the bell was heard to ring.

"Plague take it!" said he, rousing himself unwillingly; "some visitor—I wish they would take another time."

"A lady," announced the servant, opening the door, and introducing Miss Penelope.

"Your servant, madam," said Gregory, bowing; "most happy to see you. Pray, be seated."

"This is Mr. McKim, I believe," said the lady.

"The same, ma'am, at your service," he said.

"I noticed an advertisement of yours in the paper."

"Ah, yes, for a housekeeper. Can you recommend one?"

"I come to offer myself for the situation. Being an interested party," said Miss Penelope, smiling slightly, "perhaps it would be as well not to recommend myself too highly."

"Ah, ah, them. Have you ever served in that capacity before?" asked Mr. McKim, a little embarrassed.

"No, I cannot say that I have. I believe, however, I am acquainted with the duties it would devolve upon me."

"As I believe I stated in the advertisement, your chief duty would be that of superintendence, and presiding at the table. As I keep two servants, they would be efficient for all other household duties. What do you say terms?"

"That point is quite immaterial to me," said she, a little amused at the novelty of her situation.

"Shall I say four dollars a week? Will that satisfy you?"

"Perfectly. It is quite liberal. One thing I should like to stipulate. As unforeseen circumstances may arise to change my plans, and I should like to engage for only four weeks."

"As you please. When will you be in readiness to come?"

"At once. At least, as soon as I can find means to convey my baggage hither."

"Where have you left it?"

"At the hotel."

"Do not trouble yourself about it; I will send for it immediately. Oh, I had forgotten one thing—your name."

Penelope had not prepared herself for this. To give her own name was a thing she hardly dared venture upon. After a pause she said:

"You may call me Julia Malcolm."

"Miss Julia Malcolm, I presume," said Mr. McKim.

"Yes," said she, blushing slightly.

In two hours from that time, Miss Penelope's trunk arrived, the keys were placed in her hands, and the servants introduced to their new mistress. We may consider her fairly installed in her new station. Let's see how she finds it.

CHAPTER III.

Mr. McKim's establishment was a large one. Being situated but a few miles out of the city in a delightful neighborhood, many visitors were drawn to it in the summer season. Sometimes half a dozen at a time were visiting it.

Miss Penelope Penrose was well qualified to preside at a table, having always been accustomed to do so at her father's. She did so with a mingled grace and elegance that Mr. McKim was as much surprised at as delighted with. Still further, her education qualified her to mingle in conversation with a degree of intelligence which betrayed that she was well read. This qualification, so rare in a housekeeper, pleased Mr. McKim not a little, and arrested the attention of his guests.

"Certainly, Mr. McKim," said a friend, "you have a paragon of a housekeeper. Where did you get her?"

"One of the advantages of advertising, my dear fellow."

"Then hereafter I shall believe it. You must be rich, though, with such a housekeeper, you will be marrying her, and I should not blame you if you did."

"It seems to me, from your enthusiasm, that you are much more likely to get caught," retorted his friend.

The party were sitting in the parlor on a tranquil summer evening, the lights had been removed on account of the moths, which they attracted. Conversation had gradually ceased, and a feeling of quiet, such as is apt to come over the mind at such a time, had stolen upon all.

"How pleasant it is," said one of the company, "to sit here in the beautiful moonlight. But one thing is wanting to complete the enchantment."

"And that is—"

"Music."

"I was just thinking of it," said McKim, "and wishing that we had some one who could play. Gentlemen, are any of you gifted that way?"

The answer was a general negative.

"Perhaps," interposed the housekeeper, "in lieu of a better, you would wish me to play?"

"What, Miss Mateolm, do you play?" asked McKim, in surprise.

"A little."

"Then you will confer a great favor by giving some specimens of your skill."

Miss Penelope was an accomplished musician, having cultivated assiduously her natural talent, which was very considerable. In addition to this she sang very tastefully.

Without more ado, she proceeded to the piano and played with her accustomed execution a variety of pieces, some of them very difficult. Then, pausing a moment, she accompanied herself on the instrument with the words of a popular song; after which she arose and left the piano. Warm encomiums and flattering complimentes were lavished upon the singer, who received them with due modesty, and soon after retired.

After this, Penelope's musical talents, as may readily be imagined, were often called into requisition.

It was about a fortnight after this occurrence that Penelope, who had left directions to forward letters with a friend who was in the secret, received a letter informing her that her sister, who had been abroad, was expected daily, and would probably proceed at once to her residence.

This made her immediate departure necessary, and so she informed Mr. McKim.

"Leave me!" said McKim, in a troubled tone. "You are not dissatisfied, I hope?"

"Not at all; my sister's presence will render it necessary."

"And will you not return?"

"I do not think I shall be able, as my sister will probably wish me to stay with her."

Mr. McKim pared the room in some perturbation, and then suddenly drew up a chair and sat down by Penelope.

"I do not think I can give you up," said he, "and I have, therefore, another proposition to make. If you will not stay with me as a housekeeper, will you as a wife?"

"This is so—so unexpected," murmured Penelope.

"But you won't refuse."

"Let me make an explanation first, and then you shall be at liberty to do as you please. You, then, that I am possessed of an independent fortune, and merely assumed the post of housekeeper to gratify a whim; and that the time for which I had resolved to stay up here she had accomplished. My name is not Julia Malcolm, but Penelope Pearce."

This explanation only made Gregory urge his suit more vehemently, and it ended in a promise from that time that our heroine promised to become a "housekeeper for life."

MANIFESTO OF FATHER LACORDAIRE.—Father Lacordaire, a Catholic priest, has addressed a letter to the Catholics of France on the war. He says: "I feel it of great importance to protestate to declare to the world that the main cause of all the evils which war is destined to inflict on mankind, is the policy of Austria towards the Papal States. "If the Papal Government," he says, "has become unpopular and odious to its own subjects, and a mark for blame in foreign nations, it is owing to the pressure exercised by the head of the church by Austria, and to the degrading servitude in which he has been kept, particularly since 1848." Father Lacordaire expresses no doubt that the military provinces which confiscated the institutions formerly enjoyed by France, nor does he excuse the acts which led to and established the papal civil system, but he distinctly declares his approval of the policy of the Emperor in so far as it is destructive of Austrian domination in Italy—a domination which he considers as fatal to the welfare of the Pontifical States, and the best interests of the church.

CASH SYSTEM.
TO our old friends and customers: Having purchased the old establishment of GEO. PHILLER & CO., late H. R. MILLER, No. 78 Front Row, I am now receiving, direct from the manufacturers, a fresh stock of Hats and Straw Goods, bought for Cash, which I intend selling for the same. An experience of fifteen years in the Hat business in Memphis has convinced me that the credit system will not do; that it is better to sell at ten in twenty-five per cent. lower for cash, and let each man pay his own bill. I therefore respectfully solicit the patronage of my old friends and customers, and as many new ones as feel disposed to buy for cash, and more from less to pay-five per cent. by so doing.
Respectfully,
GEO. PHILLER.

THE GREAT THOROUGHFARE
OF MISSOURI.
COMPLETED and open from Mississippi to Missouri rivers, thirty-five miles nearer and 100 miles nearer PEKIN'S PEAK than any other railroad, affording the shortest, quickest and cheapest route to Western Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and Northern Pacific.
Trains leave HANNIBAL daily, at 7 o'clock a. m., on the arrival of the morning mail train from the Mississippi and Louisiana, which compose the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad line, and are expected in connection with the road leaving St. Louis daily, at 6 o'clock p. m., taking passengers through from St. Louis to St. Joseph in 24 hours, there connecting with a line of Stage Coaches for Leavenworth City, Weston, Nebraska City, Omaha and Council Bluffs, giving from 3 to 4 days over any other route. Passengers by the Memphis and St. Louis packets, and the Ohio and Mississippi and Illinois Central Railroads, make close connections at this line.
Fare lower than by any other route; Baggage checked through; meals and state rooms in packets free.
Passengers are respectfully requested to consider this route, before attending others, as it has unquestionable advantages over all others. Emigrants and their effects only route by which St. Joseph can be reached by Railroad, for sale at the principal ticket offices in the United States. For further information, apply to
