MAGDELENE.

"Was willing
Gently led to
Through the
Sweet for the sin.
Making the harbor.

Floating a mighty forest,
Harmonious waves on wave,
Through the dim cloistered arches
And the radiant-lighted nave.

Softly the incense waving,
Rest on the throbbing air,
And rose, after prostrate hundreds,
A single voice of prayer.

In it a floods of sunlight
Close to the Gothic door?
Beautifully golden treasure
Sweepings the marble floor—

Shading the pallid features,
Resting the quivering form,
Lovely even in the tears a mother
Pronounces and the raging storm?

And a flesh of autumn sunset
Over hollow cheek and eye,
Second to its fleeting beauty,
As a pure wild and high—

A wave of lovely music
Floated through the purpose gloom,
A ringing sound of measured
Nearly light and bloom.

Line ... sublime
Bearing her soul ...
In its glad music alive,
Back to its innocent childhood—
Back to its childhood leave!

The blue eyes laughed, and sweet words
The red lips wandered o'er,
The brow flung back the tresses
Young, pure and loved once more!

Hark! sad funeral numbers,
A requiem sound of woe,
Thunderous, hurled billows
Tossing her to and fro—

A wail temptuous ocean,
A sea of raging sound,
And life's dark deeds, like phantoms,
Crowing her around!

Pall after pall, like thunder,
Life's carnage, death and sin!
And the white face beneath the tresses
Covered with its weight of sin.

There is no gleam of sunshine
O one by the Gothic door—
A broken heart, and tresses
Strewn on the marble floor!

Soft as the breath of summer,
Sweet as the fairy strain,
Sifted the African music
Down the dim cloister aisles.

Hearing like a Divinity
The gold-fringed mourner stir,
Till the marble heart was stepping
Down in the marble floor.

The organ-force were whispering
Of pardon and of rest—
Her health with which another filled
Meekly across her breast.

Sealed the entreating mouth,
Closed the eyes, closed shining—
A God of mercy, relenting,
That hardened upon pain!

And over the sober mourners
Of the dim cloister aisles,
Lay on the marble pavement,
A lifeless marble form!

And were the last rich numbers
To the ear and were given,
A blessed soul was ushered
To who them in heaven.

A RIFT IN THE CLOUD.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Andrew Lee came home at evening from the shop where he had worked all day, tired, and out of spirits; came home to his wife, who was also tired and out of spirits.

"A smiling wife, and a cheerful home—what a paradise it would be!" said Andrew to himself, as he turned his eyes from the clouded face of Mrs. Lee, as she bent, down, with knitted brows, and a moody aspect.

Not a word was spoken by either. Mrs. Lee was getting supper, and she moved about with a weary step.

"Come," she said at last, with a side glance at her husband.

There was no invitation in the word only, none in the voice of Mrs. Lee.

Andrew arose and went to the table. He was tempted to speak an angry word, but resolved himself, as she did, to be silence. He could find no fault with the chop, nor the sweet homemade bread, nor the fragrant tea. They would have chosen the same, the inward man, if there had only been a gleam of sunshine on the face of his wife. He noticed that she did not eat.

"Are you not well, Mary?" The words were on his lips, but he did not utter them, for the face of his wife looked so repellant, that he feared an irritating reply. And so, in moody silence, the warm supper together until Andrew had finished his supper. As he pushed his chair back, his wife arose, and commenced clearing off the table.

"I'm purposed!" said Lee to himself, as he commenced walking the floor of their little breakfast room, with his hands thrust desperately away down into his trousers pockets, and his chin almost touching his breast.

After removing all the dishes, and taking them into the kitchen, Mrs. Lee spread a green cover on the table, and placing a fresh trimmed lamp upon it, sat down, and shut the door after her, leaving her husband alone with his unpleasant feelings. He took a long, deep breath as she did so, paused in his walk, stood still for some moments, and then drawing a paper from his pocket, sat down by the table, opened the sheet, and commenced reading. Singularly enough the paper upon which his eyes rested, were, "Praise your wife!" They rather tended to increase the disturbance of mind from which he was suffering.

"I should like to find some occasion for praising mine!" How quickly his thought expressed that ill-natured sentiment. But his eyes were on the page before him, and he read on.

"Praise your wife, man; for pity's sake, give her a little encouragement; it won't hurt you."

Andrew Lee raised his eyes from the paper, and muttered, "Oh, yes, that's all very well. Praise is cheap enough. But praise her for what? For being sullen and making home the most disagreeable place in the world?" His eyes fell again to the paper.

"Make home your home. Make home comfortable, your hearth bright and shining, your food agreeable; for pity's sake tell her you think her if nothing more. She don't expect it; it will make her eyes open wider than they have for ten years; but it will do her good for all that, and you too."

It seemed to Andrew as if this sentence was written just for him, and just for the occasion. It was the complete answer to his question, "Praise her for what?" and he felt it was as a rebuke. He read on further, for thought came too busy, and in a new direction. Memory was correcting him of injustice toward his wife. She had always made his home comfortable for him, and had tried to make it, and had he offered the light return of praise or commendation? Had he ever told her of the satisfaction he had found in her, or the comfort experienced? He was not able to recall the time or the occasion. As he thought thus, Mrs. Lee came in from the kitchen, and taking her work-basket from a shelf, sat down at the table, and without speaking, began to sew. Mr. Lee glanced almost stealthily at the work in her hands, and saw it was the bosom of a shirt, which she was stitching neatly. He knew that it was for him she was at work.

"Praise your wife." The words were before the eyes of his mind, and he could not look away from them. But he was not ready for this yet. He still felt moody and unforgiving. The expression of his wife's face he interpreted to mean ill-nature, and with nature he had no patience. His eyes fell upon the newspaper that lay spread out before him, and he read the sentence:

"A kind, cheerful word, spoken in a gloomy home, is like the rift in a cloud that lets the sunshine through."

Lee struggled with himself a while longer. His sin-sick nature had to be conquered first; his moody, accusing spirit had to be subdued. He was coming right, and at last got right, as we will. Next came the question as to how he should begin. He thought of many things to say, yet feared to say them, lest his wife should meet his advances with a cold rebuff. At last, leaning towards her, and taking hold of the linen known upon which she was at work, he said, in a voice carefully modulated with kindness.

"You are doing that work very beautifully, Mary."

Mrs. Lee made no reply. But her husband did not fail to observe that she lost, almost instantly, that rigid steadiness with which she had been sitting, nor the motion of her needle had ceased.

"My shirts are better made, and whiter than those of any other man in our shop," said Lee, encouraged to go on.

"Are they?" Mrs. Lee's voice was low, and had in it a slight tremulousness. She did not turn her face, but her husband saw that she leaned a little toward him. He had broken through the ice of reserve, and all was easy now. His hand was among the clouds, and a few feeble rays were already struggling through the rift it had made.

"Yes, Mary," he answered softly; "and I've heard it said more than once, what a good wife Andrew Lee must have.

Mrs. Lee turned her face toward her husband. There was light in it, and light in her eye. But there was something in the expression of the countenance that a little puzzled him.

"Do you think so?" she asked, quite soberly.

"What a question!" ejaculated Andrew Lee, starting up, and going around to the side of the table where his wife was sitting. "What a question, Mary!" he repeated as he stood before her.

"Do you?" It was all she said.

"Yes, darling," was his warmly spoken answer, and he stooped down and kissed her.

"How strange that you should ask me such a question!"

"If you would only tell me so now and then, Andrew, it would do me good." And Mrs. Lee leaned her head over and her face against the manly breast of her husband, stood and wept.

What a strong light broke in upon the mind of Andrew Lee. He had never given to his faithful wife even the small reward of praise for all the toiling she was doing. And manifested daily, until doubt of his love had entered her soul, and made the light around her thick darkness. No wonder that she had grown moody, nor that what he considered moodiness and illnature took possession of her spirit.

"You are good and true, Mary. My own dear wife. I am proud of you. I love you—and my first desire is for your happiness. Oh! if I could always see your face in sunshine, my home would be the dearest place on earth."

"How precious to me are your words of love and praise, Andrew," said Mrs. Lee, smiling up through her tears into his face. "With them in my years my heart can ever, lie in shadow."

How easy had been the work for Andrew Lee. He had swept his hand across the cloudy horizon of his home, and now the bright sunshine was streaming down, and filling his home with joy and beauty.—Arthur's Home Magazine.

THE MURDERER'S GRAVE.

We arrived at Lebanon, New Hampshire, at about five o'clock in the evening, and were to remain there until the next morning. It was in the month of October, and we had two hours of daylight in which to examine the town and take a walk to the river, which is here a dashing stream, and picturesque enough to have a place on canvas.

We had come from Burlington about midnight. There were but five passengers, and about the usual variety of temperament among them. I had been struck by the peculiar demeanor of a gentleman who had joined us at Montpelier. He seemed to be what would pass in any circle as an eccentric man; though he said very little during the journey, appearing to be completely absorbed in his own meditations.

After early supper at the hotel I lighted my cigar and walked to the river. It was the kind of scenery in which, above all others, I love to ramble, the dashing, foaming torrent took delight. I sat upon a rock till the charmed me, and then, regarding me darkness admonished me to return, watching the fanciful forms which the water took as it curled over and around the rocks.

As I arose to depart, I discovered, to my surprise, that I was not alone. Near the rock upon which I had been seated stood the occentric gentleman from Montpelier, regarding me with deep interest.

"I beg your pardon, if I interrupt you," said he politely, as I rose to depart.

"No interruption, sir," I replied. "I was only enjoying the fine scenery of this vicinity."

"It is beautiful," added he coldly. "Were you aware that a murder was committed in the town and a short distance from this spot about a year ago?"

"I have a faint recollection of having read of the event in the newspapers. The murdered man, I had a large sum of money upon his—had he?" I exclaimed he, in long-drawn, whispered tones, which would have lended credit to the first villain of a sterling melodrama. "The same."

"Hush. The matter was published in the newspapers at the time," I replied, amused at his earnest manner, "and it surely can be no secret."

"Hush! silence! Do not mention the subject again in such loud tones. The very rocks have ears to hear such sounds as these."

"Really, sir, you—"

"Pardon me, sir, but I must insist on your silence for the present. If you are disposed, make your fortune, listen to me."

"I shall be happy to hear you, sir."

"I have been watching you all day in the stage, and have come to the conclusion that you are a reliable man. Am I right, sir?"

"Well, I think I am, sir," I replied smiling.

"Can I trust you with an important secret?"

"You can."

"Will you give me your assistance?"

"With pleasure."

"In return, then I will give you half the proceeds of the enterprise, I have a lame arm, and therefore I am compelled to call in the aid of another, for I cannot now handle a shovel."

"A shovel?"

"Hush! my dear sir. Yonder is the murderer's grave!" said he, with a tragic gesture, while his hand trembled and his eyes rolled with the excitement of the moment.

"Murderer's grave? Why I should think it would be his victim who needed the grave."

"Listen to me, sir, and you shall know all. He who was killed had ten thousand dollars upon him at the time. The money has never been recovered. I am going to dig it up tonight."

I confess that I was very much perplexed at this astounding piece of information. I was not disposed to be credulous, though, so far as my recollection served me, the facts corresponded with my companion's statement.

"There were two murderers," he continued. "One of them died with a bloody deed, and the other watched to warn him of the approach of any traveler. But when the murderer had done the act, and secured the money, the natural baseness of his nature prompted him to retain the whole sum, instead of dividing it with his companion in crime. Instead of joining him, therefore, as had been agreed upon, he stole into the woods and attempted to elude the eye of the other.

"In this, however, he was defeated by the suspicions of his companion, who followed him to a secluded spot yonder and there killed him. He carefully searched upon the body for the ill-gotten pelf, but could not find it. Digging a grave at the foot of a tall pine whose spire you see towering far above its fellow, he buried his companion in crime and fled from the scene. In his agitation he had neglected to search in a pocket the deceased had upon the inside of the waistcoat. There, sir, the money may still be found."

"This is a most romantic story, Mr. Montague. May I inquire how you obtained these particulars?"

"Hush!" replied he, prolonging the final sprate, in imitation of Mr. Forrest. "You shall know. The survivor of the two murderers, tormented by remorse, worn out by carrying the ponderous weight of his dark secret, became insane, crazy, mad—and was committed to the Insane Asylum. I was his physician. In one of his more lucid intervals he imparted to me this terrible secret."

It was certainly a very remarkable story, yet there was nothing improbable about it, and I confess that the idea of putting the large sum of money he had mentioned in my pocket was rather inspiring, for it did not occur to me just then that the sum would be neither his nor mine. He led me to the spot where the murderer was buried, and produced a shovel which he had concealed near the spot.

"Dig," said my companion, in a hoarse, husky whisper, "and further disclosure is made."

I took the shovel; and throwing off my coat, commenced my labors. My liberal friend stood by, and encouraged me with the hope of a share in the proceeds of the murderer. I had thrown up the earth to the depth of two feet, when I began to have my doubts whether we had found the right spot.

"Dig," said my companion, "dig only one foot more, and the prize is ours."

I renewed my labors with fresh zeal; but I had thrown out a few shovfuls when I heard voices near us, and presently three men rushed down upon us.

"All lost!" cried my companion.

"We have found you at last," said one of the new comers, "and you are putting your brilliant idea into operation."

"What do you mean by that?" I demanded.

"Why, simply that Mr. Montague is a patient who has escaped from the State Lunatic Asylum."

As I put on my coat the three men laughed at me to their heart's content. One of them was the crazy doctor's keeper, and he informed me that the lunatic had told the above absurd story to every one he met, for the calculation, to a hundred different persons, and all under the seal of secrecy.

I felt cheap, as the reader may suppose, at the idea of having been "sold" by an insane man, and I did not hear the last of it till I had shaken off the last of my fellow-passengers. When I am engaged in such an enterprise again, the readers of this paper shall have a full account of it.
