MISS MARGARET ANGLIN

Beautiful, statuesque, to appear next week at the Broad.

Loew's Knickerbocker

Comedy prevails on the bill for the first half of the week at the Knickerbocker Theatre. To be sure, Edward Clark, in his feature act, introduces enough pathos in his work at times to make it somewhat an exception to the general statement. But the surrounding acts are frankly designed from start to finish for laughing purposes, and attain their end with a high degree of success.

To a piano accompaniment Clark gives a number of extremely clever character impersonations, ranging from that of a Broadway chorus girl to a pathetic sketch of a homeless street urchin. The act is novel.

Barnes and Robinson, in a piano-singing concoction, keep the audience in gales of laughter from their entrance to exit. There are scores of teams in vaudeville doing acts of the same character, but this couple are above the average.

Viola du Val has a good voice, also a bad cold, and had to cut her turn short. George Richards and company romp at high farical speed through a sketch. The Casadoes, as comedy tumblers and acrobats, show new ideas, and the Macks prove ingenious if rather strenuous dancers.

CHESTER AND VICINITY

Miss Beulah Larkin, of Walnut street, is entertaining her sister, Mrs. Henry Palmer, of Van Cuba, Del.

Mrs. M. C. Black and her daughter, Miss Anna Black, have returned to their home on Madison street, after spending several weeks at Atlantic City.

THE DRAMA

THEATRICAL BAEDEKER

ADELPHI—"The Revolt," by Edward Locke, starring Helen Ware. Driven desperate, a neglected wife seeks the gaiety enjoyed as a prerogative by her husband—but comes home ere 'tis too late.

BROAD—"Drugged," melodrama by Owen Davis, with John Mason as railroad magnate with a penitentiary past. As like real life as the novels of Harold Bell Wright, but more thrilling than actual life, even under approximate circumstances.

CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE—"Cabiria," moving-picture drama, by Gabrielle D'Annunzio, of the third century B. C. A truly marvelous feat on the reel, with a convincing volcanic eruption.

FORREST—"Ziegfeld Follies," a potpourri of songs, jokes and spectacular effects; entertaining without consuming brain-phosphorus.

GARRICK—"Adele," French operetta, with captivating music. Reversals in love, with a husband falling in love with his wife.

KEITH'S—Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle in their delightful dances.

WALNUT—"Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," by Kate Douglas Wiggin. Return of this popular, unpretentious but appealing play.

FLASHES FROM STARS

Miss Maud Adams had once to play the part of a woman who pretends to be intoxicated. In her autobiography, Miss Adams' mother tells of the incident.

"Critics marveled at Maud's interpretation. I remember that they said she was the only actress who had been able to play the part of a supposedly inebriated woman without appearing vulgar and disgusting to refined auditors. That finish was due partly to Maud's innate refinement and partly to the fine line she drew in the part.

"'I couldn't get tipsy to do it, because I am not supposed to be tipsy,' she said. 'Yet I must act it so well that the audience, knowing I have not been drinking, must still realize that my pretense is so well done that it will convince my husband that I have been drinking; it is betwixt and between.'

"That's what she worked to gain. She practiced hours before her mirror in her room until she had perfected it so that it alone would have carried the scene through.

"It was a difficult part for a young, inexperienced girl, but I will say this: even if Maud were tipsy herself she'd be refined about it."

Miss Adams returned to New York last week from her home in the Catskills, where she was resting, and has begun rehearsals for her coming season, which will be one of the longest she has ever undertaken in point of time consumed and cities visited. In Philadelphia Miss Adams will present J. M. Barrie's "The Legend of Leonora." She will reach San Francisco in time to give the play during the Panama Exposition.

Ethel Barrymore tells a joke of her father's, one of the handsomest men the stage has ever known, but one who would stay out quite late at night sometimes. He adored his wife, and liked to tease her. He would go home and ring the doorbell.

"Is that you, Barry?" Mrs. Barrymore would call out.

"Yes, whom did you expect?" Barrymore would return.

Miss Barrymore will not devote this season entirely to vaudeville, but early in December will appear in a new play, "The Shadow," by Dario Nicodemi and Michael Morton, the authors of "The Prodigal Husband." Miss Barrymore will give the play for the first time on any stage under the direction of Charles Frohman. "The Shadow" is in three acts. It was to have been presented in Paris this month by Mme. Rejane, but the production was called off on account of the war.

Edmund Breese is a chicken fancier. He has a farm near Westport, Conn., and on it he maintains 500 hens. The other day he jogged over to George Bowles' place and said:

"George, I wish you'd take a look at my hens. They're all black in the face and they have quit laying."

Mr. Bowles went to the Breese poultry estate and looked several of the hens squarely in the face.

"What have you been feeding these hens?" he asked.

"Boiled beets," replied Mr. Breese.

"Ah ha! That's the answer," came from George Sleuth Bowles. "They've got beet juice on their countenance."

"Well, why don't they lay?" asked Mr. Breese.

"Merely because they're afraid they'll lay beaten eggs," was the reply.

Louise Randolph smilingly confirmed his tale of her the other day:

She was in her dressing-room preparing to go on, when the call boy announced that she was wanted at the telephone.

"I can't go now," she replied, "take the message."

The boy returned shortly, slightly embarrassed.

"You had better come, Miss Randolph, he said, "it's your daughter, and she wants to give you a kiss over the 'phone."
