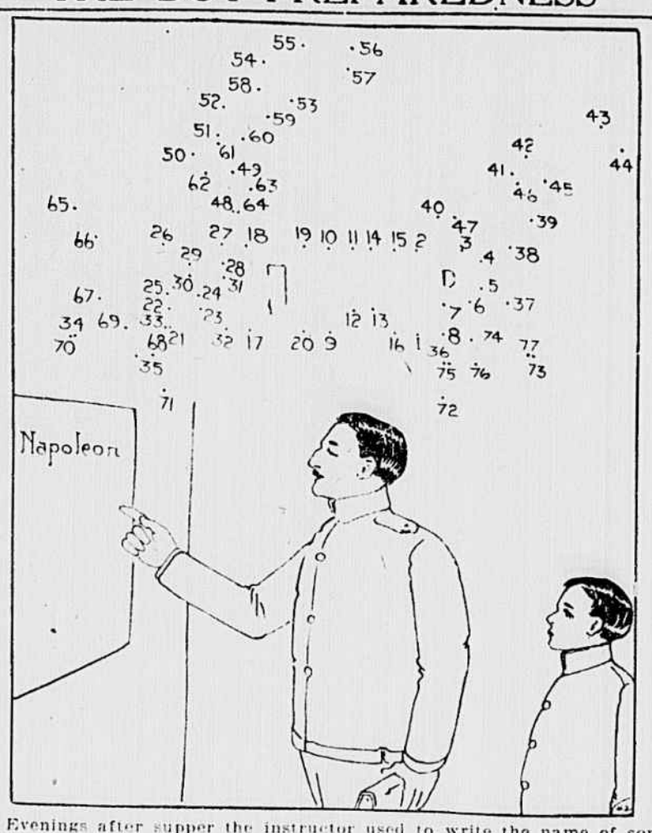
THE DOT PREPAREDNESS



Evenings after supper the instructor used to write the name of some great general on a board and ask the boys what he had done, and also whether they could quote one of his sayings. When they came to Napoleon Jim spoke up and said: "Napoleon once remarked that an army traveled on its stomach, but I never understood how they could do it."

"Napoleon didn't mean that literally," said the instructor, "but it was nevertheless true then as it is now. Napoleon found out in his wars that the men who could stand the greatest hardships and do the best fighting were those who were constantly supplied with _____."

To find out what a good fighter must have constantly join the dots with a pencil line, beginning with dot No. 1 and taking them in numerical order. Then cut out and paste each day's picture in a scrap book, and when the last one is printed, you will have "The Dot Preparedness" story complete in permanent book form.

SYNOPSIS FOR SEVENTH DAY.

John Burton, once a poor steel worker, but now a titled multimillionaire seeking an answer to the question, "Is Humanity in the Grip of Evil?" decides to leave the social whirl and seek happiness among the poor. He becomes assistant to Brother Billy, who runs a mission, and there meets Mary Ames, a beautiful young sculptress and the irrepressible three young artists seeking fame and fortune. Mary poses for Evan Parker, the distinguished artist, and John, who falls in love with her, proposes and is refused on account of his seeming poverty. Mary tells him she has accepted an invitation to accompany Parker to Paris to study, not as his wife, but as a companion. John resolves to stop Parker from going to Mary's studio for his answer. Parker resents his interference and says that a mere workman cannot understand the artistic temperament of himself and Mary.

They fought like a couple of bulls, raising such a racket in the respectable neighborhood which harbored the artist's studio that servants came running in dismay. None dared to interfere, whereupon some one sent for the police. It chanced that Brother Billy was actually talking to a roundsman when a terrified housemaid blurted out the amazing statement that a strange man, who gave his name as John Burton, was trying to kill Mr. Parker.

The two hurried after the maid, but while on the way Brother Billy thought it high time to reveal John's status. The policeman was surprised, of course, but the knowledge that he was dealing with a millionaire marquis modified his attitude considerably. John was getting the better of Parker, and had almost succeeded in breaking the scoundrel's right wrist when the policeman dashed in and dragged him off his victim.

Parker, whose senses had ever deserted him, glared balefully at his assailant, but motioned the policeman that he was simply to eject the intruder from his house.

"I bring no charge," he snarled. "I'll deal with him in another way. I know how to hurt him, the brute! I'll hit him worse than he can ever hit me!"

John understood, but had no option at that moment save to accompany the policeman. He had barely gone out when Mary dashed in. She was so wild-eyed with frenzied resolve that she did not notice at first the disheveled condition of the room and the battered state of the artist's features. But she had seen John walking down the street with a policeman, and a second glance told her what had happened.

"Did Burton attack you?" she demanded, hysterically.

"Yes," was the savage answer. "how did he come to know of my letter?"

"I—I showed it to him. He asked me to marry him."

"And what did you say?"

"I refused. I am sick of being poor. I am here to tell you now that I agree to your terms."

She had given no heed to Brother Billy, who had withdrawn to a corner of the studio when she ran in.

"What are those terms?" he said quietly.

She wheeled round on him like an angry goddess.

"What business is that of yours?" she snapped. "Keep your psalm-singing for those who need it. I don't—not yet, anyhow."

"I can guess only too well," replied the saddened evangelist. "But you have chosen wrongly, you deluded girl. You are ready to become the partner of this evil-minded man, who will cast you off when tired of you as a child discards a broken toy. And in the same breath you have refused the honest love of a man who would have made you a marchioness and loaded you down with the wealth for which you have sold yourself body and soul."

"What are you talking about?" shrilled Mary, almost at her wits' end, yet fully convinced that the old man had gone mad.

Brother Billy shook his head.

"The John Burton who shared your poverty of late is none other than John Burton, the multimillionaire, Marquis of Castleton in the British peerage, and owner of several fine estates," he said. "I have known his secret for some time. Now it is your punishment that you, too, should know it."

So John still found Humanity in the Grip of Evil.

Midsummer Motoring in Europe

8vo. 24 Illustrations. $2.50 Net.

A relief to those who, revolted at the destruction that is going on abroad, wish to recall the peaceful, pleasant, ante-bellum days. The volume presents an account of four thousand miles of travel at a progress that insures appreciation of all that the wayside and the civic centers afford. The route is through Belgium, Normandy, Brittany, Touraine, Wurttemberg, Bavaria. An interesting account is given of the Passion Play at Oberammergau in 1910.
