BRITAIN SHIPS NEEDED TO CARRY HER MEN HOME

Same Craft Ferried 1,080,417 Americans to England and France.

NEW YORK, November 27.—A statement made here from authoritative sources regarding the part British ships have played in the transporting to Europe of the American Army discloses that England may be compelled soon to use all of her available transports for the return to their homes of troops of the British empire. The majority of these forces, it was explained, have been away from their homes for periods ranging from two to four years, and, in addition, there are in England large numbers of wounded colonials awaiting transportation home.

Although the British government may be compelled to use virtually all its available transports for the return of its own and colonial troops, arrangements for the early transportation home of approximately 40,000 American troops on British ships have been effected. This includes 12,000 who have already embarked for home.

Colonials to Go Back.

There are British troops to be returned from France. Also, there are France to England, and there are Australian, Indian, African, Canadian and other colonial forces to be returend from France. Also, there are in England and France thousands of women and children, families of colonial troops, who have married there, who will require transportation.

So great will be the demand on British vessels for this service, it was said, that the use of the ships for American overseas forces may not be possible to any great extent for some time to come. Three big British transports on their way from England with American forces which trained in that country, as announced in Washington, are expected to arrive here late this week or early next.

Discussing what England has done toward moving American troops abroad, it was authoritatively stated that British vessels carried 1,080,417 American troops to England and France during the war, from the embarkation ports of Newport News, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Portland, Maine, and Montreal and Quebec. Two hundred engineers were the first to sail on a British vessel, departing May 8, 1917, followed a few days later by Gen. Pershing and staff.

These voyages, 563 in number and involving 180 British ships, terminated on September 31, 1918. The record was made by the Olympic, which transported 53,930 American troops. Last June 156,945 American troops were carried, and in July, 188,560, which was the peak month. In August 179,004 were taken across, and in September, 121,353.

Of the more than a million troops carried fewer than 500 were lost through war mishaps. The Aquitania ferried 42,150, Mauretania, 29,075; Lapland, 20,733; Adriatic, 24,521; Baltic, 29,939; Cameronia, 28,183; Corsonia, 21,900 and Cedric, 22,649.
