HANDFUL HELD FORT VAUX A WEEK

A Thousand Frenchmen Tried to Hold Off Horde of Germans.

HAND TO HAND FIGHTING.

Besiegers Took to Using Liquid Fire and the Brave Defenders at Last Had to Give Way Before Tremendous Odds—Few Survivors Who Surrendered Were in Desperate Condition.

Fort Vaux, which was taken by the Germans in their advance toward Verdun, France, had been practically besieged for ninety days before it fell. Paris newspapers estimate that it cost the Germans 100,000 men to capture the fort.

When the situation at last became critical the commandant, Chief of Battalion Raynal, a tried soldier, who had risen from the ranks, had hardly more than 1,000 men with whom to continue the defense. His task was to hold the half ruined fort against overwhelming masses of infantry, supported by more than 100 batteries of heavy guns. Re-enforcements could not reach him owing to the terrible efficacy of the German fire.

For a week, alone and unaided, he and his men held out against very great odds. Two companies of Germans were already installed in a ditch of the northern bastion, and after three days that position had to be abandoned by the French.

Raynal then withdrew to the central redoubt. He was still able to communicate at night with the main body, and one of the last messages sent was that whatever happened he would never surrender. He kept his word. Step by step the Germans advanced from the west and south, gradually narrowing the circle surrounding the fort.

Messengers Volunteer.
Every night Raynal dispatched volunteer messengers to General Nivelle to inform him of the progress of events. Not one in five of these messengers got through.

At 3:50 o'clock one morning an officer from the French lines managed in the darkness to crawl through the German cordon and reach the redoubt where Raynal was holding out. The German artillery was still pounding incessantly at the roofs of the vaults, where the garrison had taken refuge. The officer succeeded in returning to the French lines and reported the desperate condition of the survivors.

The fighting of the two previous days had been awful. Whole German regiments at one stage tried to advance against the western bastion, where two batteries of fieldpieces were posted. They were met with a point blank fire and annihilated. One company climbed to within sixty yards of the guns, but could get no farther. Several German assaults were repulsed only after violent hand to hand fighting.

When at last the assailants reached the principal entry they were met by a counterattack, the garrison making use of their rifle butts, knives and fists and even their steel helmets, which they held by the strap and swung like maces. The Germans employed lacrymoseal shells, bombs and liquid fire throwers in great numbers.

Gave Way Inch by Inch.
Inch by inch the enfeebled defenders receded, and when at last, worn out by seven days' watching and fighting, they were incapable of further effort, fresh enemy troops rushed the fort and captured the handful of heroes who remained.

Nothing is known yet of the fate of Chief of Battalion Raynal, who was gazetted on Tuesday a commander of the Legion of Honor for his gallant defense. He has been wounded several times in the present war.

Seven days of terrific bombardment, added to many previous periods of bombardment of less intensity, had reduced the fort to little more than a ruin. Its possession is still a matter of importance to the French operations, however, because of the height which it crowns and from which it had been able to sweep the ravine to the north as well as the slopes of the Meuse heights to the east.

Although the position, so far as natural defenses were concerned, was one of the most difficult to attack or this bank of the river, it was selected by the Germans in preference to other points of less natural strength, because from its position on the extreme east of the line it received the least support from the banking batteries on the other bank.

Facing the Germans on the right bank of the river is the line from Froida Tere to the town of Souville and Tavannes, both situated at heights of great natural strength.
