The Manchester Journal.

N. K. SIMONDS, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 13, 1877.

The election in Maine shows a large falling off in the number of votes cast. Both branches of the legislature will be overwhelmingly republican, and Conner's majority will be between four and six thousand. In California the Democrats have carried the majority of the officers elected this year.

Maine, being the home of Blaine, was more likely to go strongly against the President's policy, than any other republican state but the recent election does not show it, unless by the falling off in the vote, which is no less than in 1872 and other off years. Neither party made any effort to get out the voters and the republicans seem to have held their own very well

In New York the democrats are badly divided, some wishing to renominate the present state officers, and it is understood that this is Tilden's wish while others are opposed to such a course. It almost comes to be a test question whether the New York democracy will favor the renomination of Tilden in 1880. In New York City there is a strong opposition to Tammany hall which may work considerable mischief to that party.

During the past week the Russians have made a desperate attempt to take Plevna and there was a report that they had succeeded, but later reports do not confirm the report. Their losses have been very heavy. There is no doubt that the Russians have succeeded in flanking the town and that the condition of the Turks in Plevna is desperate unless a diversion is made in their favor by the two other Turkish armies in that vicinity. The Turks and Russians are pretty well sandwitched in and there is no foretelling how it will come out, though the advantage of numbers and resources is with the Russians.

The Apostles of the Mormon Church, joined by J. W. Young and Daniel H. Wells, late counseller of Brigham Young, publish a circular saying that on the 4th of September they held a meeting, waited upon the Lord, who blessed them and revealed to them the steps they should take. John Taylor, Senior Apostle and acting President of the Twelve was unanimously sustained in that position, and it was also decided that the quorum of twelve apostles is the presiding authority of the church. This was the plan pursued at the time of the death of Joseph Smith, and was sustained by Brigham Young. To facilitate the transaction of business it was ordered that President John Taylor be assisted by John W. Young, Daniel H. Wells, and George Q. Cannon. The circular urges all saints to be faithful in building temples and paying tithing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

STEAMSHIP COLONA, PACIFIC OCEAN,
OFF CENOS ISLAND L. CALIFORNIA,
August 5th, 1877.

The second Wednesday after sailing from N. Y. we came in sight of the Isthmus. Long lines of beach stretched along the shore in every direction, and above them rose long sweeps of feathery forest. On the left we could discern the distant mountains of Columbia, (New Grenada), the upper spurs of the Andes, and not differing so much as I had expected in the shape and anatomy from our own Green Mountains. The town of Colon, or Aspinwall, presents quite an attractive appearance from the sea, and 'though most of my fellow travelers pronounced it the nastiest, vilest and most unattractive town in the whole length and breadth of America, I was very much interested and could have passed several days there very agreeably in studying the singular inhabitants. Early in the afternoon, we drew up to the Pacific Mail Pier, passing three large steamers of the English & Atlas American line. Full two hours were consumed in getting the ship in train along-side the pier, an operation which would probably have been completed in an American town in fifteen minutes. The wharf was crowded with Jamaica negroes, about a quarter of them were drawling about ostensibly at work, but how in the world such efforts produced any result is a mystery to me. About fifteen or twenty colored gentlemen were at the capstan hauling the cables taut and the way they worked that capstan, was something to be remembered. They dragged themselves around, some with one hand on the arc, beome using the bars as horizontal walking sticks to aid them around, all on the broad grin. I cannot yet imagine how those cables were ever hauled in.

There were several very small darkies visible, probably proprietors of a faro establishment, or bar in the city, dressed in white duck suits, low shoes with heels under the instep and the most gorgeous of striped stockings. There were also swell ladies of color with pink kid boots, plue parasols and attire, or rather want of atire, strongly suggestive of the tropics. The Claytons, (Consuls to Callao, Peru,) Miner and myself went ashore before dinner to explore a little. The office of the Pacific Mail is at the left of the long pier and is an excellent building, one of the best in Aspinwall, and between it and the entrance to the pier is a fine garden crowded with choice tropical plants, orchids, ferns &c., and with every variety of orange and acacia trees. Passing through a grove of the largest cocoanut palms we entered the business street of Aspinwall. The buildings occupy only one side of the street the dock and water front occupying the other. The Panama railroad is laid throught the street, and the railroad cars are the only wheeled vehicles one meets in Colon. The buildings on this street have a decidedly foreign aspect, two or three stories high with piazzas extending the whole hight of the house and over the side walk, forming a continuous arcade along the street. In this arcade, which is the market and thoroughfare of the town, the Broadway and promenade, one sees vareid and animating sights. As there are no horses, carriages, wagons or carts in Colon there is a vast amount of foot travel through the arcades, and as the inhabitants of the houses spend most of their time out of doors on the covered pavement with buying and selling, bantering and joking, gossiping and visiting things get considerably mixed up some times. Moreover there are many cages of paroquets, parrots, monkeys, chickens, etc., disposed at the most favorable angles for entraping the toes and shins of unwary wayfarers. Piles of bananas, plantains, oranges, limes, pineapples, mangos, cocoanuts, etc., complete the obstructions and make it absolutely impossible for a traveler to walk once through without lightning his purse and increasing his luggage. We indulged ourselves with limes for lemonade and mangoes, a singular fruit resembling a small gourd or squash, belonging, I should judge, to the peach or plum family. Clayton stopped to barter with an old hag as black as midnight, for big cluster of bananas. Her price he thought too high, and I said why, its banana season is'nt it Auntie? No, it aint, my sweet darlin, auntie replied, to my embarrasment and to the amusement of the others. These negroes are a perfect study. Most of them are from Jamacia, and one sees every shade of coloring from midnight black to the cream color of Topsey. Some of the women are quite pretty, and as we walk along the arcade they suspend their gossip, take their cigaretts from their mouths and make all sorts of comments on the apperance of the strangers. Many speak Spanish, French and English, (though English is very generally spoken on the Isthmus now), so their agreeable remarks are generally understood. I have been mistaken for a Spaniard from the first, and the niggers of Aspinwall were no exception. One would say, look at Senor's blue handkerchief, and another, Lord mighty! what a collar the Spaniard wears, looks like a jib sail reckon it came from Mercky. We went into the Howard House to see the great hotel of Aspinwall. The first room from the arcade was the office, containing several billiard tables, a large bar, presided over by a very fat landlady, and tables for roulett and faro Every body drinks here, and throughout the tropics, but one meets few drunken men. I went into the court yard of the hotel, and looked about a little, and was quite amused to see how empty wine bottles were utalized. The yard is laid out in diamonds, stars, crescents, etc., bordered with wine bottles driven into the earth neck downwards. This use of bottles is universal in South and Central America. Sometimes paths, and driveways are paved in this way. After dinner, we went to call upon Col. Thorrington, the American consul. He lives upon the beach in a part of the town devoted to foreigners and quite free from the nastiness, smells and jargon of lower streets. It seems strange enough to see no carriage drives, and to watch the surf, rolling to the very doors of the houses. The consular residence is very pleasant. The drawing room commands a delightful view of the harbor, through large doors, which always stand open. The house is furnished with wood, no plastering and no carpets or curtains obstruct the circulation. Mats of pretty plaited straw take the place of carpets, and the furniture is of straw and rattan. Next door to the Consul's is the Episcopal church, the only church in Aspinwall, and built by the railroad company. It is cruciform in shape with a tower at the chancel end. The material is of brown and blue stone, and I think it is as elegant and tasteful a church as I ever saw. Near the depot at Aspinwall is a large bronze statue of Columbus, presented to the republic of New Grenada by the Empress Eugenie of France.

Early Thursday morning we said adieu to the Crescent City and Aspinwall and turned our faces Panamawards I enjoyed every moment of the ride across the Isthmus. The forest is far more beautiful than I imagined, but I will not attempt to describe it except in the most general terms. From Aspinwall to Panama the road passes through an almost unbroken forest. Occasionally banana plantations are seen, the broad leaved, luxuriant foliage differing but little from the uncultivated growths. We passed several corn fields, the cultivation of which would fill the soul of a thrifty Yankee with deepest dismav. The corn is apperently hoed into the ground, and left to itself until the harvest. Great grasses, reeds, ferns, vines and flowering plants dispute every inch of ground with the legitimate crop, but such is the richness of the soil that the corn seems to thrive passably well, notwithstanding the intrusion of less useful plants. Great palms, acacias and a kind of tree somewhat resembling the live oak, often tower high above the surrounding forest. There is nothing like uniformity in hight as with us. The lower trees are usually most beautiful, draped and sometimes entirely concealed with luxuriant vines, many of them gemmed with brilliant blossoms. The tall trees appear to be tied to the ground by those singular parasitic growths, resembling cord, and varying in size from a threadlike fineness to the thickness of a cable. These parasite hung trees have often been compared to the masts of a ship and the comparison is not inapt. The sides of the road are for many miles completely overgrown with the singular sensitive plant. The leaf resembles the acacia leaf, with the exception that it is much finer and very much more delicate. At the slightest touch every leaf upon the entire plant closes, but opens when the hand is removed. You can imagine how much I enjoyed those forty-seven miles across the Ithmus. I had never seen so many varieties of the vegetable creation in all my life before. Such profusion of flowers, such gorgeous colors and exquisite shapes. The popular idea that the flowers of the tropics are gaudy and coarse is a slander. I never saw more beautiful and delicate flowers than the Isthmus produces. The Negro and Indian villages through which we passed gave a pleasant diversity to the ride, and furnished an oportunity of studying human nature, as well as plant life in the tropics. These opportunities of studying could not well be surpassed, as human nature is revealed in all its primitive simplicity indeed very little of it is in any way concealed. All the inhabitants of the village turn out to see the train pass and the scene from the car window is novel in the extreme. The clothing of the women is quite neat, as far as it goes, and consists of one flowing robe. White seems to be the fashionable color. The women wear a sort of flounce or ruffle of flowered muslin around their shoulders forming a sort of waist and sleaves, others wear less or nothing above their waist. The men for the most part wear blue trowsers and the children in the black, brown, or cream colored garments of nature, in other words, stark naked. The houses of the natives are very picturesque, built of canes sometimes plastered with mud and with high conical roofs of heavy thatch. The doors standing open and I noticed few windows, the crevices between the canes affording, I presume, ample light. One village made quite an impressive picture. It consisted of some forty or fifty huts on the other side of the Chagres River; many dug-out canoes of peculier shape were stranded in front of the village, in the rear too were plantations of bananas and cocoanut, in front the turbid, sluggish river, and all around the beautiful strange forest. Another circumstance struck me as singular, viz., the tameness of the birds. We passed quantities of birds feeding along the track, none of them took the slightest notice of the train and many were almost within arm's reach. Quantities of parrots in the trees would cock their heads on one side and look at us benignly. I believe that the birds are as lazy as the natives and would rather be killed than move. About noon, without the slightest indication to warn us of our approach to civilization, we found ourselves in the suburbs of Panama. The railroad does not enter the city proper at all, but passes to the left or south east of the town. It was the greatest of aggravations to be so near the city and not be able to go over it. After leaving the cars at the wharf we were hurried through the pier past great hogsheads of whale oil from the South Seas and piles of mahogany logs. After embarking on the steam launch, which conveys passengers to the steam ship anchored five miles down the bay, we had time to look at the quaint old Spanish city. It presented almost exactly the appearance I had expected. Built on a little peninsula jutting out into the bay, an old crumbling sea wall falling into ruin around it. Broad two storied houses with balconies on the second floor overhanging the side walk where the dark skinned senoritas swing in their hammocks and enjoy their cigaretts; low roofed churches, with massive towers of Moorish architecture, their quaint carving furnishing foothold for rank grasses and fringes of parasitic plants, the final crosses hung with wreaths of living verdure; the old Cathedral in the center of the city with its rows of tongueless bells; the bare footed, cut-throat looking soldier sauntering laxily along the promenade beneath the palm trees; the shallow green water between us and the city, dotted with lighters and canoes laden with luscious pine apples, oranges, bananas, plantains, melons, etc, which can be obtained almost for the asking; the musical Spanish tongue rippling over the water sellers: all these features, combined, made a picture I can never forget. Just before the launch Deming came on board, and took me ashore to see his office, which adjoins the pier. The floor and walls are of stone, to insure a cool temperature, and there is a court yard in the rear where flowering trees are always in bloom, and an immense monkey disports himself. Hurrying back to the launch we were soon steaming for the Colona. Flocks of buzzards hover constantly over Panama and Aspinwall, they are the scavengers of the city and are protected by law. As we passed around the city towards our ship we could see the great birds perched on the steeples, and house tops, darting down to the ground as their sharp eyes detected some choice morsel. Panama Bay is a resort of the emblematic pelican. They are always to be seen flying over the water in long lines. Deming lunched with me, and soon after we were underway for San Francisco. * * It is now the 10th of August, tomorrow we shall be in San Francisco. The mountains of California are in sight, only six or eight miles distant. I have had a delightful journey, made some exceedingly agreeable acquaintances, and am almost sorry to think we shall land tomorrow. L.

STATE NEWS.

Quintus C. Rich, of Larrabee's Point, opposite Ticonderoga, has this season harvested and threshed 204 bushels of barley from three and one-fifth acres of land.

An old lady in North Troy, aged 91 years, is just recovering from the whooping cough.

Thomas Cunningham, 22 years of age, was run over by a freight train at St. Albans early Saturday morning and died in a few hours.

During the State Fair the Central Vermont proposes to carry persons from Rutland to St. Albans for $2.50; from Burlington to St. Albans and return for $1; from Montpelier and return for $2; from Bellows Falls and return for $3; from Middlebury and return for $2, and from all other stations on their lines at rates proportionally low. These rates are less than half fare.

Hayden, the Derby line murderer, will be tried on the 11th inst. The counsel for the defence are Gen. W. W. Grout of Barton and Hon. Henry Ballad of Burlington, and Mr. Wilson of North Troy. The defence will be insanity, which without doubt will be proved to have existed both before and since the tragedy, and to have been hereditary. He was removed from State prison Friday and seemed in good health and spirits.

The Burlington University opened Thursday with 30 students in the freshman class. Prof. J. E. Goodrich has been transferred from the chair of Latin and Rhetoric to that of Greek; Geo. A. Smyth, who has just returned from a course of study in Germany, has become professor pro tempore of chemistry and mineralogy; Rev. J. I. Bliss, of Burlington, has accepted the chair of Rhetoric and English literature, and S. W. Davis, a recent graduate of Harvard College, has been appointed instructor in Latin.

The Bennington and Rutland railway company took possession Monday of that part of the Harlem Extension railroad, from Rutland to North Bennington and Bennington to State Line. Amicable arrangements have been made with the Central Vermont, Troy and Boston and Hudson River railroad, so that trains will run, making the same connections as heretofore, and the New York and Montreal line will be kept up. No difference will be made in passenger or freight rates. Treuer W. Park, Esq., will be the general manager and E. C. White, Esq., the superintendent. The Superintendent's office will be located at Rutland. There is no immediate prospect of the south part of the Harlem Extension between Bennington and Chatham, N. Y., being reopened.

The sheriff of Franklin county has served papers on P. H. Bailey, late town and village collector of St. Aalbans, for the collection of $2,500 shortage on Bailey,s State tax account. Bailey says the shortage is owing to uncollected taxes, and he shall raise the money to satisfy the State at once. Rumors are circulated that he is short in his accounts with the town, but Bailey disclaims any intentional crookedness and invites an investigation.

Edward S. Piper, who swindled the Rutland banks out of $15,000 or $20,000 by forged papers about ten years ago, and was sentenced to eight years in the State prison, died Sunday at Joliet Ill., under an assumed name.

Wednesday morning the Central Vermont depot at Royiton, was entered by burglars and the money-drawers of the United States & Canada Express Company and the railroad company were broken open. No valuables were taken.

The Freeman states that a block forty feet long, 17 high and 10 thick, and weighing about 618 tons, was quarried without the use of powder at the Barre grasite quarries the other day. It was perfect in every way and is considered the largest piece of granite ever quarried in the State.

James C. Hopkins, of Madison, Wisconsin, Judge of the United States District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin, died on the 5th inst. He was a native of Vermont, and was appointed Judge of that district in 1870.

Miss Katie Lee, of Fletcher, while suffering from tooth ache, last Friday afternoon, put in her mouth what she supposed was camphor, but what was really corrosive sublimate, and although recognizing her mistake at once, she, in her pain and excitement, accidently swallowed a portion of it. The results came near proving fatal.

Hon. Homer W. Heaton, of Montpelier, met with a painful accident at Barre, Tuesday afternoon. While examining mill property he fell upon a rock and fractured the neck of the femur or thigh bone.

Archibald McIntyre, a tanner, employed for the past few years by James Huntoon & Son, of Shrewsbury, and before that foreman in Bradford's tannery at Wallingford village, left his home near Cuttingsville, Monday morning, the 3d inst., and was found the following Wednesday morning hanging to the limb of a tree, about eighty rods from the house. The deceased was sober industrious, and respected by all, and although a brother of his died in an insane asylum, no one suspected him of suicidal intentions. He leaves a wife and five grown children.
