NOTICE TO MARINERS.

The latest examination of the 30 foot dredged channel in the Delaware River shows a depth of 30 feet or more on the center line throughout the entire length of the channel. There is a small rock area on the western side of Tinicum Range, opposite the upper end of Chester Island. The least depth over the rock within the channel limits is 32 feet at mean low water. There are also shoal areas, composed partly of ledge rock, in the western half of the channel at the lower end of Chester Range and at the upper end of Marcus Hook Range. While there is no ledge rock within the channel limits of either Marcus Hook or Chester ranges projecting about 30 feet at mean low water, vessels drawing more than 26 feet should navigate the eastern half of the channel, which is clear of all obstructions to a depth of 30 feet or more at mean low water. There is a dangerous rock area lying to the westward of the intersection of Marcus Hook and Chester ranges and between these ranges and the Old Schooner Ledge Range, opposite the large slag pile of the Delaware Steel Works at Chester. The lower limit of this rock area is marked by a horizontally striped buoy and deep draft vessels should keep to the eastward at this point. The wreck of str Katahdin, sunk Oct 23, 1917, lies about 400 feet southeastward from red gas buoy 27, at the intersection of Tinicum and Chester ranges. The least depth over the wreck is about 15 feet at mean low water.
